Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous Illustrations.

Poetry.

"Ballynaghfad."

I remember well when I was young,
Of a jolly smith who gaily sung
In his low, dark shop, 'neath tall, dark trees,
That caught the soul of the summer breeze;
And his voice was sweet as the summer day
Ennobling toil with a simple lay.
The steel shoes shaped to a rhythmic rhyme,
His gleaming hammer beating time,
And such a chorus the echoes had
When he sung his song of "Ballynaghfad."

'Twas a tortuous, dancing, gleeful strain
That carried us over the Irish main,
Where the white-haired harpers came and played,
And we saw the dancers all arrayed
In the shamrock's hue, for the criss-cross reel,
(They danced them then both toe and heel),
And "down the outside," full of grace,
The couples meet at the crossing-place,
And swaying past each waiting line
Their hearts are held in thrall divine.
And the piper's strains, though often sad,
Were gay on the green of "Ballynaghfad."

And I think they sipped the "mountain-dew,"
Though the smith was temperate, strong, and true;
He sang that song of the flowing bowl
As though it dwelt in his inmost soul.
And now I know 'twas not the words
That made his song like the singing bird's,
But a joyous heart defying rust,
Lighting his face through smoke and dust.
An honest life so bright and glad,
He well might sing of "Ballynaghfad."

And men of learning sought him there
Amid the din of the dusky air,
Where he whistled and sang, reciting by turns
The gems of thought from Robert Burns.
"Ah, wad some power the giftie gie,
To see oursel's as ithers see!"
Thus ready rhymes would smoothly flow
For good and ill, for high and low;
For every hap of youth or age
Some line flashed from his favorit page.
That tattered volume on his knees,
He scorned the idler's slothful ease,
Rending oppression's bolts and bars,
Till his anvil bore the shocks and scars,
And truth was purged of useless dross,
While the bellows blew its breath across,
And the fires of wrath the cool stream had Scattered afar with "Ballynaghfad."

Now this merry man of sterling worth
Has gone the way of all the earth.
And I dreamed of him not long ago,
And the dream impressed and thrilled me so,
And it seemed so true as I wandered lone
Where a high wall rose of seeming stone,
And at the opening set within
Stood he who once the smith had been.
That window framed with leaves of June,
Whose measured sway was a silvery tune;
And I saw beyond the hills and flowers
Of heaven, fairer than all of ours—
Only a glimpse, but it said to me,
"Glorious scenes has this summer sea."
And a beautiful face the angel had,
Though the man had sung of "Ballynaghfad."

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

Different Kinds of Boys.

"No more long-faced, sanctimonious-looking boys for me," said one of Boston's oldest merchants, as he sat toasting his shins before his counting-room fire. "It isn't natural for boys to look that way, and when they do I can't help suspecting 'em of being frauds. I hav had at least three of that description since I started in business, and they hav all turned out bad. One of them stole, and the other two could not be trusted the minute my back was turned. The one that stole came the pin racket on me."

"What is the pin racket?"

"A number of years ago a story appeared in a Sunday-school paper—where I would not be apt to see it—about a poor boy who applied for work at a large wholesale store. The proprietor told him he did not need any help and the boy started to go out. Just as he was leaving the store he saw a pin on the floor, and, picking it up, stuck it in the lapel of his jacket. The proprietor saw him do it, and, thinking that a boy so thrifty must be of some account, called him back and engaged him to go to work the next day. The boy, of course, ultimately became a partner in the concern, and subsequently a millioniare.

"Well, the boy I speak of had read the story and concluded to try to play it on me. He dropped a pin on his way into my counting-room—so as to hav it all ready—and the dodge worked just as he hoped it would. I saw him pick up the pin and place it in his jacket, and did, of course, just as the man in the story—called him back and gave him a job. He was a keen one and no mistake, but he is now in the penitentiary for stealing from me.

"The next boy that applied for work had a black eye and his shoes looked as if they had not been blackened for a month. He whistled, I know, coming up the street; nipped a handful of raisins on his way in, and stood chewing them with his hat on his head, when he asked: 'Mister, do you want to hire a boy?' I noticed, also, by the way, a pack of cards sticking out of his pocket. He had a good, bright eye, though—that is, the one that was not blacked—and I hired him, principally because he was so different from my other boys. He was a boy, every inch of him, and I had to tone him down a little, of course: but he was worth any dozen boys I ever had before or since. He is now—you may be interested to learn—my partner, and by his industry and business ability has at least doubled my fortune within the past seven or eight years. I accidentally learned that the cards he had in his pocket when he first entered my store were some that he had bought for his crippled grandfather with money earned by shoveling snow. The sight of those cards would hav at once prejudiced some men against him."

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intainsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers he world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,
WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain
Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,
Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Gems of Thought.

Every one's duty is first to provide for himself and for his own household, but this being faithfully performed a love for humanity is the next highest and holiest sentiment he can feel. Humanity is our highest object of reverence.—D. M. Bennett.

WE must respect them that are of kin to us; and, on the other hand, we must not forget the relations we owe to ourselvs and the rights of our own individualism. Among the most precious of them are the rights of conscience. No one, how near and dear soever, has the right to interfere with these. No husband has the right to say to his wife that she must barter away her principles for his sake; no wife has the right to say that to her husband. No parent is a true parent that seeks to hamper his children in the formation or in the exercise of their convictions; that transcends the bounds of parental authority. Such a parent should hear such words as these: Father or mother, I shall never cease to love and revere you, or to obey you in all things where you hav a right to command; I shall always be grateful for what you hav done for me; I shall always yield whatever it is in my power to dispose of; but my convictions I cannot yield; for they are mine neither to giv nor withhold, and with faithfulness I will maintain them; for though you gave me life, you cannot, without guilt, take my life away, nor can I violate my own soul, that is my life of life. . . . Few things we must cultivate—one is respect for the ties which nature has given; and the other is repect for the integrity of conscience, which no man can disregard with safety.—Prof. Adler's Emancipation.

EVERY young man who has a love for speculation ought to study Locke's works. He should try to master his great work, the "Inquiry into the Human Understanding," and, at any rate, he should master his small work, "The Conduct of the Understanding;" and to make even this little treatis his own thoroughly, and enter into all its meaning, he will find a most bracing and wholesome mental exercise. —Principal Tulloch.

BY the verdict of Christendom the human mind is impotent to find the truth. The Christian looks back upon the religious development of the past and finds it a series of frightful mistakes and atrocious blunders; a chaos of superstition; a wild farrago of hideous dreams. There monstrous idolatries show, in the judgment of Christendom, what degradation the human mind sinks into when left to itself. With what different feelings the rationalist, clear minded and instructed, looks at the same facts! We are persuaded that all religions come out of the human mind in the process of development; that they are all efforts, and earnest efforts, on the part of men, to understand the conduct, and to get at the secret of the universe. Hence there is no credulity, however blind; no superstition, however dark; no error, however misleading; no idolatry, however grotesque; no delusion, however visionary—that does not represent a phase in this effort of the human mind to gain more light upon the problems that are flung down in its path.—Frothingham's Sectarian Spirit.

TRANSPLANT yourselvs, for a moment, to the coast of Africa. What is that burden which yonder naked, dark-skinned savages are bearing down to the seashore? They hav slain a victim, a man, and now they heave it, throw it far out into the surf, and the cry from within is drowned by the gurgling of the waves. And that is an offering to the spirit of the waters, that he shall protect their fisheries.—Felix Adler.

THE conquest of Asia by European powers is in reality emancipation, and is the first step toward the establishment of oriental nationality. It is needless to say that Europe will never again engage in crusades to liberate servil populations; but the pride and ignorance of military despots will provoke foreign wars, which will prove fatal to their rule. Thus war will, for long years yet to come, be required to prepare the way for freedom and progress in the East; and in Europe itself it is not probable that war will ever absolutely cease until science discovers some destroying force, so simple in its admistration, so horrible in its effect, that all art, all gallantry will be at an end, and battles will be massacres which the feelings of mankind will be unable to endure.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

AS regards the two famous texts, "He that believeth not shall be damned," and "Blessed are they that hav not seen and yet believed," it will comfort those who wish to preserve their reverence for the character of a great teacher to remember that one of these sayings is in the well-known forged passage at the end of the second gospel, and that the other occurs only in the late and legendary fourth edition, both being described as being spoken under utterly impossible circumstances. There precepts belong to the church and not to the gospel. But whoever wrote either of them down as a deliverance of one whom he supposed to be a divine teacher, has thereby written down himself as a man void of intellectual honesty, as a man whose word cannot be trusted, as a man who would accept, and spread abroad, any kind of baseless fiction for fear of believing too little. —Clifford's Ethics of Religion.

WE should embrace Christianity even on prudential motivs, for a just and benevolent God will not punish an intellectual being for believing what there is no reason to believe; therefore we run no risk by receiving Christianity if it be false, but a dreadful risk by rejecting it if it be true.—Colton's Lacon. [Note.—Colton generally speaks sense and his Lacon is still worth reading; but in the above extract he drops the sincere and straightforward man and puts on the quibbling priest. As to Christianity, so far as you find it true, and there are many valuable truths in it and around it, defend it without fear or favor; and as to what is false in it, and in the course of eighteen centures it has contracted many falsehoods, speak out boldly and cast it from you. The idea of finding safety in pretending to believe, when you cannot attain the reality, is the most mean and cowardly cause that a man can pursue. Even Byron has recourse to the same mode of arguing, but he spoke from the teeth outwards, and if he had always spoken so, his name and fame would, by this time, hav been forgotten.—Hylax.]

Please cut this petition out, attach it to a blank sheet of paper, sign your name and address to it, get all your friends and neighbors to do the same, and then send it to this office.

A PETITION FOR STATE SECULARIZATION.

To the Honorable Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress:

A republican form of government being based on liberty, equality, and fraternity, as both means and end, involves the separation of Church and State, whose union is the worst form of class-legislation and the most infallible sign of arbitrary power. A house divided against itself cannot stand. The institutions of this Commonwealth should be made homogeneous throughout. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of truth in whatever direction. Any infringement by government of this absolute equality of its citizens is the parent of manifold evil, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, this government was founded to "establish."

And yet, though the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," there does exist a union of Church and State, which gives to Christianity moral and material aid, and so proscribes other religions and forms of belief and unbelief, while taxing these also for the support of that special religion.

The ways in which this old alliance between Church and State still survives among us are:

1. Recognition of God and Christianity in State Constitutions.
2. Exemption of Church property from taxation.
3. Appropriations of public money for sectarian purposes.
4. Religious exercises, as the reading of the Bible, etc., in the public schools.
5. Laws enforcing the observance of the Sabbath on the authority of the Bible.
6. Religious test-oaths in courts of justice and on instalment into office.
7. Chaplaincies in the Legislature, the Army, and the Navy.
8. Fast and Thanksgiving Proclamations, which contain theological ideas that may or may not be acceptable to the citizen.

The necessity for this separation of Church and State is more apparent now than ever before, because of the still greater diversity of religious beliefs, the many forms of dissent from the religion which receives State patronage, and the growing signs of sectarian strife and ambition in the arena of politics. And emphasis needs to be given to the fact that the union of Church and State is a great hindrance to the employment of right methods in dealing with many questions of reform now demanding attention. And most essential is it at all times, and especially in the present, in order to secure for the law its due respect and observance, that the people's representatives should exhibit the strictest fidelity to their trusts by following the law in its letter and spirit.

Your petitioners, therefore, pray that immediate action be taken by the law-making power to bring into harmony the theory and practice of our government in making the following principle a part of the fundamental law of the land by amendment to the United States Constitution:

The total separation of Church and State, by prohibiting Congress or any State, County, Municipality, or Township from enacting any law that favors religion in any of the eight ways specified, or in any other way, or prohibits the free exercise thereof.

Odds and Ends.

THEY don't say in Boston now, "I got the cart before the horse," but "I placed the articulated circumlocutory vehicle in precedence of the quadrupedal vertebrate."

"KISS Me as I Fall Asleep," is the title of the latest song. It is intended, we suppose, as a pointer for young men who take their girls to church Sunday evenings.

IN the blizzard country. Man, pointing musingly over the hills and far away: "Yes, I came West to look after my property. I am looking after it now. There go the house and barn."

"THE tenor of a Harlem church choir is named Batter. He can rise up to the highest notes without the least difficulty if the church is warm, but it stirs him all up for the ladies to spoon on him.

WHEN Barnum parades his white elephant out West, we advise him to hav a band precede it with the sacred air, "Yes, Whiter than Snow." This will establish confidence in that extremely moral community, and call out the full quota of church goers.

"PAP, how big was Adam when he was borned?" "He was a man and as large as a man when made." "Then he never didn't hav any boy fun, did he?" "No." "And right away got married?" "Yes." "Good golly! No wonder he never laughed none."

WHILE talking to a number of gentlemen, Mr. Beecher remarked: "I never speak of a country nor place authoritativly unless I hav previously been there." "How about that sermon of yours on hell?" asked the wag of the party. Mr. Beecher took water, while the rest of the boys called for a more popular beverage.

A WHITE squall caught a party of tourists moving across a lake and threatened to capsize the boat. When it seemed that the crisis had really come the largest and physically the strongest in the party in a state of intense fear said: "Let us pray!" "No, no, my man," shouted the bluff old boatman; "let the little man pray—you take the oar."

"Is there a dude club in this city?" asked a stranger, entering the editorial room. "There is," returned the editor, as he produced a toothpick from his pocket and laid it on the roll-top desk; "that's it, and the first dude that shows his head in this office will be brained with it." With a deep sigh the stranger turned and disappeared.

"I SEE Sommers has busted." "Yes; he's gone up." "Did he bust well." "I hav nothing to say about that." "What is your opinion of him anyway?" "Well, he being a member of my church and in good standing, my public opinion of course is that he's an honorable man, but my private opinion is that he's one of the grandest rascals out of the penitentiary."

THERE AGAIN.

The poet stood at the editor's door,
And nervously there did he knock;
He'd knocked at that door so often before
His rap did the editor shock.

"What! you here again?" as the door swung wide,
"And another poem, by jing!"
"Ah! yes; I am guility," the poet sighed.
"The subject?" "A Welcome to Spring."

"'SPACIALLY JIM."

I was mighty good-lookin' when I was young,
Peert, an' black-eyed, an' slim,
With fellers a-courtin' me Sunday nights,
'Spacially Jim!

The likeliest one of 'em all was he,
Chipper, an' han'som', an' trim,
But I tossed up my head an' made fun o' the crowd'
'Spacially Jim!

I said I hadn't no 'pinion o' men,
An' I wouldn't take stock in him!
But they kep' up a-comin' in spite o' my talk,
'Spacially Jim!

I got so tired o' havin' 'em roun'
('Spacially Jim!)
I made up my mind I'd settle down
An' take up with him.

So we was married one Sunday in church,
'Twas crowded full to the brim;
'Twas the only way to git rid of 'em all,
'Spacially Jim.

THE SUMMER GIRL.

In winter time you seldom meet,
'Mid society's gay whirl,
One half so natural and sweet
As the honest summer girl.

Her eyes now sparkle with good health
Her cheeks bloom like the rose,
But now she's got, alas! a wealth
Of freckles on her nose.

No paint nor powder there you'll find,
No nonsense in her talk,
All affectation's left behind
In the city of "New Yawk."

She now pronounces all her r's
As plain as you or I,
And she can climb the orchard bars,
And when she does—oh, my!

Her knowledge isn't now confined
To satin and to silk,
But in the country you will find
She knows good buttermilk.

She asks no longer for an ice,
As though she scarce could eat,
But here she calls for bacon twice
And other kinds of meat.

She's not afraid of fishing worms
That used to set her crazy,
But picks one up and as he squirms,
Exclaims: "Oh, what a daisy!"

But, take this maiden as you may,
She is a priceless pearl,
And though I like her anyway,
She's best as the summer girl.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Notes and Clippings.

THE revised Old Testament will be completed in July and published next autumn.

THERE are thirty-five Mormons and forty-four Gentiles confined at the Utah Penitentiary.

THE Boston Watchman says that within the last nine years nearly 800 churches hav been burnt in America.

A CHURCH of England divine has just published a biography of Judas Iscariot, intended as an apology for the famous traitor.

THE following question is to be wrestled with by a country debating society at its next session: If a Mormon has eight wives and buries one of them, how much of a widower does he become, if any?

A PETITION was presented the other day by certain distressed weavers in Madras to the governor of that province addressed: "To Almighty God, care of his Excellency the Governor of Madras."

A RELIGIOUS weekly tells "how to keep from going to sleep in church." One way is to change your minister; but the most effectiv way is to go fishing in the morning and remain home at night to rest.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER'S work on Education has lately been translated into Chinese, having already been translated into all the living languages of Europe, as well as into Japanese and Chinese and several of the vernacular languages of India.

THE recent Papal encyclical against the Freemasons is aimed at no less than 138,065 lodges throughout the world, with 14,160,543 members, whose annual receipts are estimated to amount to about 890,000,000, of which sum fully two-thirds are expended in charities.

AT a general conference of the M. E. church, in Philadelphia, last week, a motion permitting "females" to preach was lost by a vote of 126 to 222. If the sisters would avenge this insult, says the Sunday Free Lance, by withdrawing from the church in a body, it would collapse in a holy minute, and its preachers would be compelled to make an honest living by hard labor.

RHETORICIANS tell us, remarks Scissors, that the slang phrases and idiomatic expressions of one period become the language proper of the next. If this be true we can expect in the next revision of the Testament to find the story of Adam and Eve treated thus: "And the Lord grew hot under the collar at the manner in which they monkeyed around in the Garden of Eden, and he gave them the grand bounce."

"I DON'T like these comic operas," said Mrs. Prim to her husband, the deacon. "Why not?" inquired the deacon, as he got out his Sunday coat to attend the third consecutiv night. "Why, the ballet is rather too void of dress," answered his good wife. "Yes," replied the deacon, "but the music is so sweet. We must take the bitter with the sweet." "Yes," insinuated his wife, "some folks like lots of the bitter." And then she put on her bonnet to go with the deacon.

"I HES to call de 'tention ob de brudders an' sistahs ob dis congergation to de conterbution box. De total receets frum de las' collection 'mounted to seben cents, four buttons, and a piece ob shabin' soap. Now, if dar be any brudder ur sistah in dis congergation whut kin lib a week on dat sal'ry let de same stan' up. No pusson stan's up. Dat am evidence ye kain't. An' if yer want ter hole up der dignerty ob de true 'ligion, yers got ter 'crease de parsimony. De sabior hisse'f kain't lib on dat, less de chicken surplus twixt Sundays am mighty brisk."

THE Chicago Times publishes the following: "A man in Wilcox County, Ala., has a remarkable tree growing in his yard. It is of the China species, is ten feet in circumference, and its top has been blown away by a storm, but six and one-half feet up the trunk of this tree two more China-trees hav sprouted, taken root, and grown up as high as the old tree is; and just half a foot further up the trunk of the old original tree a peach-tree has taken root, grown up to fair dimensions, and is now filled with fruit. At another place there is a blackberry vine and also an elm bush, all in a flourishing condition."

THE march of what is called progress, remarks Mr. B. R. Tucker, starting from Europe and breaking up several peaceable nations en route, all for the glory of God and the elevation of humanity, has made nearly the compass of the earth and produced some results. The blessings of civilization and a horde of missionaries were foisted upon the unobtrusiv Japanese some years ago, and the other day arrived in this country a special embassy from Japan to examin the latest American improvements in deadly weapons. The highest civilization being that which employs the most effectiv applianees for committing wholesale murder, Ambrose Beirce remarks that "Japan is now taking the last step upward to the light, and on the muster-roll of cultivated Christian nations her name will soon be inscribed in as red blood as the best of them."

A STRANGE story is being circulated in Naples of an incident that occurred in the church of San Maggiore, where some priests of the so-called mission are preaching. The preacher of the evening had chosen for his theme the terrors of hell. The church was crowded. Near the pulpit stood a figure of the Madonna. All at once, in the middle of the sermon, the lights went out, and the figure of the Madonna disappeared. The priest, striking the desk with an iron chain, cried out: "We are falling into hell! Look, the Madonna has fled! Call on her; call, or woe to us!" The panic was universal; women fainted, children screamed, and there was a rush to the doors, which were found to be carefully closed. At last the police appeared on the scene, and got the doors opened, and the congregation escaped into the open air without injury, beyond a few bruises and the loss of various articles of wearing apparel.

THE young people of Norwich, Conn., are making serious innovations in the old and established usages in church worship of that old city. In fact, it is dangerous to attend church service and attempt to enjoy it by indulging in the time-honored snooze. Recently one of the good deacons went to sleep, and on waking found that a boy had cut all the buttons off his coat. Another good deacon who was enjoying his customary nap with his mouth wide open, to drink in, as it were, all the good things, came near bei n choked to death by a gum drop which one of the girls in the choir dropped through his mouth into his throat, while another was aroused by a lot of spit balls hitting him on his bald head. And all this occurred in one Sunday morning. These things are regarded by some people as indecorous, but the fact probably is that they are only virtuous attempts to revolutionize church service in accordance with modern religious progress.

A COLORADO farmer having been to a revival meeting, felt very religious, and as they were entertaining some city friends he thought the proper thing to do would be to hav morning prayers. So the household were assembled, and he began by reading a chapter in the Bible; then he requested them to kneel while he made a prayer. He commenced. Ten minutes passed, twenty, then half an hour. The listeners began to grow restless, but still he prayed with unabated vigor, with no sign of a termination. His wife was in despair; all the farm work had yet to be done, beside the house work, and she felt sure the kitchen fire would be out and their chance of dinner slim indeed. She was perfectly in accordance with his wish for morning prayers, but to hav them continued all day seemed literally too much of a good thing. At length, unable to endure it longer, she leaned over and whispered to him: "John, don't you think you hav prayed long enough?" "Yes," he replied, "but I don't know how to wind the damn thing up!"

THE case of Mrs. Mordecai, a gentlewoman of Baltimore, who became violently insane in church during the service on a recent Sunday evening, was made the more shocking to her friends by the suddenness with which the malady appeared, and the absence of previous suspicion of danger. In this case the trouble is thought to be accounted for by the fact that the victim had been exposed to the direct rays of the sun for several hours a day or two before the attack; but cases of the kind are not rare, even where no such explanation exists. Maudsley and other writers record many instances, and a curiously sad one occurred some years ago in South Carolina. A distinguished clergyman of that state went wildly mad between the reading of his text and the beginning of his sermon. He was removed to a hospital, treated for the disease, and restored to apparently perfect mental health. After a considerable period, he undertook to preach again in the pulpit in which his attack had occurred, and again between the text and the sermon he became a madman —that time beyond hope of cure.

AMONG the first Confederate troops that went out from Arkansaw, relates the Arkansaw Traveler, was Parson Geesmore, who enlisted as a chaplain. He was a devout Christian, and his prayers were regarded by the men as utterances from a higher power. Just before the battle of Jenkins' Ferry, the old man in a sermon, said: "My dear boys, I hav decided to go into the next fight with you. I don't think a man can properly preach about the evils and sensations of war unless he has experienced the feeling of going into battle. Now, the next fight in which we engage shall hav me numbered among its participants." The old gentleman rode a large gray horse, and when preparations for the battle of Jenkins' Ferry were being made, he appeared on his snowy charger. Some of the officers begged him to keep out of danger, but with an expression of heroism he replied that he would engage in the battle. The first artillery fire from the enemy shot the horse from under the old gentleman, and by the time he settled himself on his feet a bullet came along and took off one of his fingers. He attempted to be calm, but just then a ball carried away the right thumb, and, wheeling around, the old man struck a determined trot for the rear. "Hold on, parson," called some one. "Hold on hell!" he replied. "Ask a man to hold on when the whole damned universe is shooting at him. Take care of your body and the Lord will take care of your soul."

JOE COOK'S faculty for making himself disagreeable seems to improve with age. The Lansing Telegram relates this incident: On Tuesday morning, as one of Porter & Goodrich's hacks was on its way to the L. S. & M. S. depot, a traveling man with a heavy "grip" hailed the driver and told him he would ride. He had a freshly-lighted cigar in his mouth, and as he went toward the hack its occupant notified him that a smoker could not ride with him. Politely tossing the cigar aside, he approached the hack, but the occupant again informed him that he could not ride with him, that he had hired that hack. The man of the "grip" without reply told the driver to go ahead. Arrived at the depot, the aristocratic passenger tendered half a dollar as his fare, but the driver told him it was, in this case, a dollar; that he could ride anywhere in the city for twenty-five cents, but if he hired the hack all for himself the fare was a dollar. The vituperation and loud abuse that flowed from that man's tongue is almost beyond belief. "Liar," "thief," etc., with the usual stock expressions of a blackguard, flew thick and fast. The station agent, hearing the altercation and knowing his duty as an officer of the law, put in his appearance and demanded to know the cause thereof. The autocrat of billingsgate vented his vials of wrath and ugly spleen on him in terms not fit for publication, but was finally obliged to listen to our "Mack" long enough to be convinced that he must both keep still and pay the dollar demanded. With many threats that he would report Mack as in league with liars and thieves, he departed. This was the Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston.

News of the Week.

FIFTY thousand persons visited Coney Island last Sunday.

R. B. HAYES, ex-president, announces that he will vote for Blaine.

ISAAC DAVIDS, clothier, sold a pair of trousers last Sunday and was arrested for violation of law. This in the nineteenth century.

THE pope has directed that a special commission of cardinals prepare a protest to French Catholics on the subject of the divorce laws.

GEN. GRANT has severed his connection with Parson Newman's church. This is an event upon which it is thought both the church and the general can be felicitated.

THE annual gathering of the Baptists has just been held at Detroit, Mich. They report that large sums of money hav been raised, but not sufficient to stem the tide of unbelief that is washing away religious landmarks.

THE Salvation Army was treated as a nuisance by the police of Cleveland, Ohio, and its members were arrested accordingly. In London, Ont., five members were arrested and fined for disturbing the public peace.

THE English police say that certain dynamite conspirators they thought had fled the country are still hiding in London, they hav reason to believe. The government has drawn the attention of the French authorities to dynamiters in Paris.

MOODY and Sankey hav been invited by the evangelical Christians of India to visit that country in the interest of the variety of superstition represented by those revivalists. The many converts to Buddhism made by Col. Olcott and Madam Blavatsky hav alarmed the Christians and led to this step.

THE Rev. Henry Kimball preached a gospel-temperance sermon on the city hall steps in New York last Sunday. A park policeman of German extraction remarked as follows: "Dot beesness is a skin vrom the wort it goes. Efery man at dot dembrance sermon vas droonk, und der oder half vas pickpoggets."

FATHER DUCEY, the priest who ran away with Eno, the bank president, faced his congregation again last Sunday, and read from the Bible, "Judge not that ye be not judged." Mr. Ducey is in a position that certainly requires the exercise of great charity to absolve him from the suspicion of complicity in a serious crime.

THE Rev. Mr. Simpson, of this city, said in a sermon last Sunday: "I would that a great shrinkage in the nominal membership of the Christian church all over the world might take place and millions be reduced to a few thousands who believe in Christ with all their hearts." This is a consummation not altogether to be dreaded. Mr. Simpson believes that the age of miracles will return. It is evident that the age of misguided enthusiasts is already here.

THE Republicans in Convention at Chicago last Friday nominated James G. Blaine, of Maine, and John A. Logan, of Illinois, for president and vice-president of the United States. Blaine won on the fourth ballot, receiving 411 votes against 207 for Chester A. Arthur. His nomination was then made unanimous. Logan was nominated by acclamation. Blaine is 54 years old, and is a man of great ability, but it is alleged that his public record is cloudy. He was born in Pennsylvania, and is a member of the orthodox Congregational church. Logan's age is 58. He has a good war record as a general in the Union army. He was formerly a Democrat. The result of the Convention is a disappointment to many Republicans and a cause of jubilation with others. It is noticeable that few of the prominent Republicans were present and the candidates were feebly presented and supported. No words was spoken that will liv in history like those of Col. Ingersoll in 1876, when, in a magnificent speech, he presented Mr. Blaine as the Plumed Knight.

Decoration Day.

The New Festival of the Dead.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE 342D MEETING OF THE LIBERAL CLUB.

The Decoration Day services at the Liberal Club were held at 220 East Fifteenth street on the evening of that anniversary. The platform was bright with flowers. Mr. Samuel P. Putnam presided, introduc- first Miss Adelina Peters, who performed a solo on the piano, and Mrs. McCune and Mr. Houghton, who sang a duet. Mr. Putnam then read the following

DECORATION DAY POEM.

Nature forever flings its flowers where darkest places are;
Its wealth of life blooms over death, and givs to night its star;
Its heart of fire breaks forth in joy, and flames a deathless glow,
And summer's promis haunts the sense o'er winter's bleakest snow.

To-day the roses fill the air, and over all the graves,
Like a bright ocean, surge and rest in many-colored waves.
The soft winds sing in triumph as they touch the petals fair,
For 'tis the garniture of life that glows resplendent there.

For death is life in other form; it is not nothingness;
It is a change, we know not what, nor thought can ever guess
What it may be beyond the range of what we know to-day,
But what has lived forever livs in being's endless play.

The living present holds the fruit of what far years hav cast,
The stream of time is rich to-day with heartbeats of the past.
The flowers we giv are nurtured by the blood our fathers shed,
Their deeds are wrought into the light that shines above our head.

We backward look for one glad hour, and pour our service sweet,
And beams of hope are gathered from memory's crowned seat;
The crystal yesterday contains the flash of heavens to be,
The coffined dust dissolves and sweeps into morn's golden sea.

O beauteous flowers! ye still convey the secret joy of earth,
O'er the sad portals still ye write of new and wondrous birth;
Ye are the language of the sky, jeweled along the sod,
Raying from every darksome spot message of life abroad.

O crown of death! and wreath of life, brief glory of the year,
Nature's eternal gospel, too, beyond the senses' sphere;
For still your vanishing hues do tell of that which dieth not,
Your very briefness is the grace whence noblest faith is taught.

Then cover all the graves with flowers, oh, cover them deep and sweet;
Fling roses, lilies, violets, and make the gift complete,
Till the past shall shine with glory, like a morning on our way,
And make the present vivid with love's immortal ray.

Then into the glowing future we pass to grander scope,
While all the flowers of earth become like glittering wings of hope.
The gifts we giv the dead to-day become to-morrow's fire,
By which we still press on, achieve, and conquer, and aspire.

Another piano solo, rendered by Miss Stivers, and a song sung by Mrs. McCune, were succeeded by an address by T. B. Wakeman on "The 'Dead Past' Not Dead." He spoke as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN: Perhaps the principal objections to Liberalism, on the part of those who know little or nothing of it, are summed up in the charge that it is a wild insurrection against the Past which strikes down all motiv for the Present and all hope for the Future.

This notion is essentially false. It arises wholly from the unscientific views of the Past, and its relation to the Present and the Future, which hav come down to us from the old Theological and Metaphysical views of the world, and which are found to be chiefly illusions.

Under all forms of Theology, for example, the Past dominated all there was of human life and hope by sheer authority of tradition or revelation which claimed to be the voice of God. The Past was the supreme influence, the realm from whence issued the power of a mighty Priesthood, binding the Present and Future in bonds stronger than iron; for they reached not only the bodies but to the very souls of men.

Modern Progress, under the general name of Liberalism, has justly rebelled against this false view, this limitation, of the Past, unsustained as it is by facts and evidence, and which is now seen to be the father of most of the evils and curses which afflict the human family. Against such an iron-bound and binding tyranny of the Past, let us rejoice that Liberalism has brought relief by a decisiv and victorious insurrection, which givs us light, liberty, and growth. Nor is the Metaphysical view of the Past much better; under that solution of the world, the Past was the mother of all of those so-called "first principles" which were assumed as the foundation of all right and wrong, of Nature, and of Law, under which the lot and fate of Man on earth must be dominated. To these abstract unverified principles every part of the Present and Future was supposed to be eternally subject. Philosophical schools of ideologists, under this view of the world, took the place of the Priests of Theology and enslaved us in the name of ideas and abstract notions in the place of the revealed commands of the gods, as of old.

Thus both of the dominant solutions of the world prior to science, that of the gods and that of ideas, has enthroned the Past as a tyrant, and made the Present and the Future merely its annexed and conquered provinces, to be considered of value and to be administered only under the dark shadow and the iron, unchanging, unprogressiv empire of the dead. Right well, therefore, has our American Longfellow, in his noble "Psalm of Life," protested against this view, and sung:

"Trust no future, howe'er pleasant,
Let the dead past bury its dead,
Act, act in the living present,
Heart within and God o'erhead."

The true view is that the past, present, and future are immense and equally important grand divisions of the mighty unity of human existence. Each is unintelligible without the others. But modern Liberals hav done well in laying emphasis upon the Present in view of the greater emphasis which has been heretofore given to the Past and Future by theology, often reducing the Present to a mere preparation for them, a vale of humiliation, a valley of tears, a pendulum between the Dead Past and a Life hereafter. In that view it was a great victory to discover that our Life was something in and of itself, that the chief object of life was to liv, and that this sun and star lit Hall of Earth, revealed to us by glimpses of the sun, had a meaning than which nothing can be more sacred, solemn, or touching. Why thou "revisit'st the glimpses of the moon?" is Shakspere's soul-touching query to the ghost. But these, our days, are the glimpses of the sun shining down upon us through the mighty chasm of the Present, walled in, as it appeared, on either side by those mighty, unchangeable, adamantine walls of time, known to us as the Past and the Future. Through that chasm of the Present, as through a rampart breach, the whole human race rises each day and charges on in the struggle for existence, and always with assurance of certain death. Such is the picture the great German poet-sage, Goethe, has given of the tragedy of human life. His little verse suggesting it will haunt for years whoever grasps its meaning:

Eine Bresche ist jeder Tag,	A new-made breach is every day,
Die viele Menschen erstuer- men.	Which many men are storming;
War auch in die Luecke fallen mag,	Let fall in the gap whoever may,
Die Todten sich niemals thuer- men.	Of the dead no heap is forming.

What a picture, what a vision is this of human life, considered as a mighty tragedy! But why are the dead not forming? Why is the gap never filled with the dead?

Science with it last solving word answers. That word is Evolution, and it, as with a magic wand, transforms and annexes the Past and the Future to us, to the Present, in a grand continuity of natural sequence and law. It shows us how we arise out of the Past, as the realm generativ of all things, and how we pass on to the Future, the home of all, and what we call the Present is the few moments of consciousness, when in the transition we pass the glimpses of the sun, like motes dancing in a sunbeam of the darkened room of existence. Under the lessons of Evolution these three mighty realms of existence cease to be tyrannies dominating each other, but are reconciled as indispensable parts of one grand continuity of memory, activity, and hope. The dead do not form as they fall, for they pass into and become parts of the wall on either side, and so make the new day ever possible.

Without the Past no Present could be, and without a knowledge of the Past, no Present is intelligible, no Future is possible or worthy of hope. Right well, therefore, has you Committee ordered that on this occasion the Past should be considered as the foundation of the Present and the Future in a Trilogy of addresses, as the Greeks used to present Prometheus as one Tragedy in there parts. He who follows me [Mr. Dawson] shall speak of the Living Present, and then Mr. Andrews shall properly close with the Ideal Future.

Spiritual things can only be discerned by Symbols. Let our old Scandinavian Symbol of the Tree Igdrasil, the Tree of Life, which was their deep-meaning solution of the world, come before you now and fix in your minds and hearts the lesson that evolution givs of the new view of the continuity of these three mighty realms of time.

Of this Tree of Existence, of time itself, the roots are indeed buried in the realm of the dead, the Past, and hidden from our eye, yet from thence came all there is of life. The trunk, which symbols the Present with all its strength and utilities, grows from them, is impossible and unintelligible without them. Hence arises the glorious Future, the head or full-top of the tree, with its leaves, flowers, and fruits expanding into the boundless hereafter of aspiration, liberty, and hope. This symbol, Tree of Life, is one of the oldest and yet one of the truest pictures of existence. Under Evolution it is more than ever fruitful in lessons and admonitions. Truly, as Goethe said:

"Would'st know the highest, the best?
The tree [this Tree] shall teach it thee.
What that unconsciously is,
Consciously be thou—that is all!"

The first lesson is, that we must accept the Past, not as of old, a Tyrant, but as our Parent, venerable, venerated, beloved, immortal, indispensable. Therein must lie our ever-continuing roots of life. The Present is but the surface of the Past. The Present has no meaning, except as by the eye of law we retrace the vistas of memory, and learn how we came to be as we are, and thence learn the true prophecy and hope of the Future. The realm of the dead is the earnest and the foundation of life, without which it were not, and without the knowledge of which, life itself is but an idle and foolish moment of sensation; a thoughtless bubble floating a moment on the infinit sea of the unknown, then gone forever. Our sublime democratic Poet-Loafer ("I loafe and invite my soul," he says) has given us an estimate of this lesson of the Past, which we should heed. We must get the Past in true perspectiv, and never over-rate it in any talk about Greece, and Rome, and the old "art-masters," etc., as I hav so often heard done even in this club. All the Past's triumphs hav only a historical value, and are steps to the Present, and are always less than the Present when truly seen, as the Brooklyn Bridge is greater than the Pyramids. But now hear Whitman:

"I conned old times,
I sat studying at the feet of the great masters;
Now, if eligible, oh, that the great masters might return and study me!

Dead poets, philosophs, priests,
Martyrs, artists, inventors, governments long since,
Language-shapers, on other shores,
Nations once powerful, now reduced, withdrawn, or desolate,
I dare not proceed till I respectfully credit what you hav left, wafted hither,
I hav perused it; I own it is admirable;
I think nothing can ever be greater—nothing can ever deserve more than it deserves;
I regard it all intently a long while,
Then take my place for good with my own day and race here.

Creeds and schools in abeyance,
Retiring back awhile, sufficed at what they are, but never forgotten,
With accumulations, now coming forward in front,
Arrived again, I harbor, for good or bad—I permit to speak,
Nature, without check, with original energy.

In the name of these states, shall I scorn the antique?
Why, these are the children of the antique, to justify it."

Then is it well that as Liberals and as Republicans we assemble to honor this New Festival of the Dead who hav died for us. For the dead are those who people the Past; from thence, from their urns, they rule us with their mighty scepters of thought. They only giv continuance to time, and enable us to enlarge our existence.

The next lesson is that as Liberals we greatly need to deepen our knowledge of the Past, and our feelings of devotion in reference to it. Education, culture, development, or as our German friend (Dr. Carus) said in his lecture before us last Friday, our up-building (Bildung) must come from a better knowledge of the Past. All true education, like true charity, begins at home—is, in a word, always self education. Let us then, as Gothe admonished, ever keep some of the great works of the Past in literature, art, and history before us. Let us consult them, and breathe their atmosphere daily, if even for a few minutes only. Let us in that way learn to calculate the latitude and longtitude of the Present historically as evolutionists, and know our position as children of the Past, and as heirs of time, which is our own seed-field.

Thus we should be prepared to honor, as this day we are called to do, those who hav fallen in the great struggle that has made our land free. Too soon is it, perhaps, to see and honor them rightly for the priceless treasures which their blood and toil hav secured. Only succeeding generations who become aware of the beneficent consequences can do that. But we can inaugurate the day, and strew their graves with flowers. We can rescue their memories and their sacrifices from ever encroaching oblivion and send them down the stream of time to a distant future who shall appreciate, and whose appreciation shall form at once a heaven and an immortality to those who hav made it possible.

Nor to the victors only let us be grateful. They hav risen high, because they had noble opponents. The lever avails only because of its fulcrum—only the conquered could lift aloft the conquerors. It is a shallow philosophy and a narrow view of life which says only to the beaten, "Væ victis! Woe to the conquered." "When some time be passed over," as Bacon says, we must say, "Glory to the conquered; to the lost cause!" That cause must hav been great and strong to hav made the better cause greater and stronger. Thus ever has Humanity grown by and from its victories. But more than that. The lost cause always has an equity and an element of good, "a spirit of good in things evil," or it never could hav been striven and died for by great, honest, and earnest men. When the excitement of the hour passes, the first duty of the victors is to inquire for and to recognize that good which may else be lost. Ever will it be found that the lost cause has made a mistake only in its emphasis, or way of reading the lesson of the time. All that they struggled and died for has its side of truth, which must be recognized and incorporated, in due perspectiv, in the historical progress of the race. In our own land let us cheerfully recognize it. State rights must balance, but not overthrow, the general Union of States and people. Slavery, to which evolution shows we owe civilization itself, teaches devotion of the weak to the strong, and of the strong to the weak. That devotion was defeated when the laborer became a chattel, and not less so will it be defeated in keeping him as a wage serf.

True perspectiv sees all the religions, revolutions, and institutions of the past as steps of progress. Thus our Republic must gather the spirit and substance of good from things evil with noble devotion and impartiality. For all which time has begotten or may beget are needed in our great Republic as parts thereof. Indeed, of the whole world it may be said that all the parts are needed and must be co-ordinated and molded into a higher unity, the Republic of Man, for all are children of the great Humanity which in proper time and place hath had or will hav need of them all.

THE LIVING PRESENT.

A song by Mr. Houghton intervened, and Mr. Andrew H. H. Dawson followed. He said:

MR. CHAIRMAN AND LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: When I entered this hall this evening, I did not know on what subject I would be expected to address you. The invitation I received requested me to appear here, on the evening of Decoration Day, and participate in the exercises of the club, as one of three speakers. I only glanced at the note, but supposing of course that it was to celebrate this day, I immediately replied that I would do so, and went on to say that I felt that there could be no question of the propriety of my taking part in such a celebration, and I will now proceed to giv the reasons why I said so.

On the 6th day of October, 1866, there was assembled in the Brooklyn Academy of Music as brilliant an audience as ever challenged the composure of a public speaker. It was a mass meeting called to ratify the nomination of John T. Hoffman as the candidate of the Democratic party for governor. He was to speak himself, and did. The war was just over, the reconciliation of the sections was one of the great objects of the Democratic party, and its leaders there felt that it would be a practical stroke of policy to secure a speaker from the South for that occasion, and I was selected; and I now ask your permission to read to you what I said in the conclusion of that speech, as you can but find it appropriate to this occasion:

"The South was not the only sufferer in the war. The North lost many of her bravest and her noblest sons. Even amid the storm of battle, death seemed ever aiming his fatal shafts at bright marks. Therefore, let the North and South meet as friends in affliction, having common griefs—sacred sorrows. Let us consign to oblivion's fathomless gulf the trials and troubles, hatreds and horrors of the past, and let us teach our lips the language of love toward each other. Let us recur as seldom as possible to distasteful and disagreeable themes, and let our allusions to the fallen, on the one side and on the other, be always respectful and kind. Every man who fell fighting, where his conscience told him duty called him, won a name that generations yet to be born must rise up and honor; and let us never desecrate the ashes of these brave martyrs by the rude trampling of unholy feet.

'On Fame's eternal camping-ground,
Their silent tents are spread;
Let Glory guard with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.'

"Woman is earth's angel. She is the morning star of man's infancy, the day star of his manhood, and the evening star of his old age. This is her golden opportunity to play an angel's part in her country's salvation. Let but the daughters of the North and the daughters of the South meet with their floral offerings annually, on some great memorial day, on the field where our heroes 'sleep their last sleep,' and let their flowers mingle their fragrance as their tears fall together upon the lowly pillows of the loved and lost. Let them kneel together there, and let their prayers for the welfare of our common country rise, as it were, on the wings of the same breath, and soar to heaven; angels will be in waiting at the portals of the skies to bear them to the footstool of the great white throne; and the God of our country will hear and answer them; fraternal feeling will revisit this riven land; man will recognize again in man his brother; sectional prejudice will pass gradually away; radicalism will receive the rebuke it deserves, and peace and prosperity, harmony and happiness, will crown a national glory and grandeur without a parallel in the annals of ages."

This, ladies and gentlemen, is the first suggestion that ever was made, or certainly ever then had been published, of the day we are here to celebrate. This speech was reproduced by the press in every state in the Union, and this suggestion of a Memorial Day was universally approved, and that universal approval has culminated in a legal holiday; and I trust that the members of this club will do one of their own members the justice to attribute an allusion to its origin less to a desire to be egotistical than simply to mention a fact with which vanity should hav less to do than justice.

But I am expected to address you on the "Living Present," and I am called upon to do so when I hav made no preparation for anything of the kind, and must follow one of the profoundest thinkers of this age, who has just entertained you with a dissertation upon the mighty past, sustaining his well-deserved reputation for eloquence, and an eloquence, by the way, that is always instructiv.

It happens to be true, however, that very little preparation is necessary to talk for fifteen minutes about the "Living Present." No man could hav lived sixty-five years in this world, as I hav, without having been well posted by his observations upon the subject of the "Living Present." I deny that even the past is dead. I insist it still livs, and must continue to liv while time lasts, as an instructor of the present and the future; and if the past still livs, certainly the present cannot be dead. Within the space of fifteen minutes I could hardly make an invoice of the facts which prove this to be, to all intents and purposes, a living age. I would not hav to go out of this great city, where the energy of life is illustrated in so many forms and phases, such heaving throbs of power and of progress, such wonderful achievements in the arts, sciences, professions, and vocations of every description, and above all, in the onward and upward march of the catholicity of concession, the resignation of superstition to the necessity of listening with patience to bold expressions of independent thought, of conscientious convictions, of newer, brighter, and broader views of life, of duty, and of destiny, than hav heretofore circumscribed discussion, proscribed enlightenment, and fostered bigotry, arrogance, and ignorance.

I agree with no member of this club in his views, perhaps, about anything, except the right of every man to the untrammeled privilege of thought, feeling, and speech so long as they do not insult the feelings or injure the rights of his fellow-men. I can neither run with the hounds of orthodoxy nor hold with the hares of Infidelity, but I can differ with each respectfully, yea, deferentially, for there can be nothing more uncertain than what is the exact truth as long as it is insusceptible of practical demonstration, and there is no sign of the times that furnishes more grateful evidence that this is a living age than the strides which popular sentiment is daily making onward and upward in the new-found patience of toleration.

One peculiarity about the present is its fore-doomed fate to become the past, which is equally true of the future. Hence one of the missions of the present should be to furnish instruction to the future, when it shall become the past, in order that it may inspire the future to emulate its example in such usefulness when it, too, in the eternal progress of years, shall hav become the past. One of the fatal curses of the present is the defectiv and incomplete systems of education with which it is handicapped. Man is born with the shackles of passion upon him. He is the hereditary slave of avarice, of malice, of jealousy, of vanity, of ambition, and of envy, and his education is incomplete as long as it leaves him under the control of these wicked and wayward passions, the moral effect of which is painfully illustrated in the recent revelations made in Wall street, where it would seem that a man who had won an immortal name by his genius as a soldier, and had woven around him the love of a great people by his services as a patriot, and had challenged the admiration of all mankind, and had been rewarded, not only with the gratitude of his own country, but with the respect of the rulers of the world, could consent, after having tasted of power, after having acquired a splendid fortune, could not yet be satisfied, but had to stoop to the dirty business of increasing his wealth by giving, over his own signature, permission to a reckless adventurer to utilize his fame and his influence in business transactions that were covered all over with the leprosy of fraud. What will the future think of this? Point me to a spectacle, if you can, in the past, of a similar character, any more degrading. The great question is, What should the present do about it—the living present? It is by no means certain, my friends, that we can afford to congratulate the present on all of the life that animates it. We hav made progress, it is true, but it is not true that this progress has brought us nearer to God—has discovered anything whatever in the resources of man to establish any firmer and better governments than we hav had in the past. We may hav greater institutions of learning than we hav ever had before, more and better hospitals and benevolent institutions, and may be doing a greater amount of good than ever was done before—all this may be true, without its being true that we hav made the progress we should hav made in the moral world, in the higher missions of humanity, and in the spheres of practical usefulness. The same wickedness is here that provoked the flood. The same trick Jacob played sticking those reeds by the side of the brook is being played in a thousand forms on each revolving day we liv, and, strange to say, the success of all manner of frauds seems to be regarded as one of the signs of the life of the present. Exactly what most distinguishes this age is not free from doubt. It might be called, and probably will be by some historians, an age of inventions and discoveries. Another class of thinkers may characterize it as an age of accidents; and as most of those accidents hav been the results of greed and carelessness, it might safely be christened as an age of negligence and of cupidity. Beyond a doubt it is a living age, and I commit it to you, and you to it, with an admonition to watch it, study it, and do all you can to improve it.

Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, recited his poem, published some time since, entitled, "The New Born Soul."

THE IDEAL FUTURE.

Stephen Pearl Andrews said:

I am expected, here to-night, to take the deep and broad foundation which has been sunk by Mr. Wakeman, and the staid and elegant edifice which has been erected on that foundation by Mr. Dawson, and to put on the dome, and the cornices, and the friezes; to complete the general external decoration; to hang out a few banners flying in the wind, and so, in a loftier and more aerial way, to finish up their work. I might, in the first place, take issue with a concluding remark which fell from Mr. Dawson, to the effect that my task must be the most difficult one, inasmuch as it is impossible to know the future. In the first place, I might take direct issue by averring that, on the contrary, it is quite possible to prognosticate the future, and in many respects with absolute certainty. The aim and crowning glory of science is prevision. Science is the true prophet, who foretells, within his own limits, with undeviating certainty. The old religious prophets spoke with such dubious vagueness that the world has been puzzled ever since to know when and how and if their foretellings hav been fulfilled; but when science foretells an eclipse the whole world knows that without fail the event will occur at the very moment indicated.

Or I might take indirect issue with Mr. Dawson's remark, and say that for the very reason that the future is in great part unknowable it is all the more easy to plunge into it through the imagination unrestricted by the severities of history, as in the case of the past, or of extant observation, as in the case of the present. At all events, I feel very free here to-night to draw upon imagination. I am not here by my own election. I hav been drafted into this service. My subject has been assigned to me, and it is "The Ideal Future." I am not, therefore, held to scientific certainty, or even to scientific probability. By placing me here on this platform with such a subject and no limitations you hav taken the cap off, or drawn the cork, which might hav repressed the exuberance of my idealization and held me nearer to the track of sober reality. I therefore put the responsibility upon you for whatever I may say or suggest. I hav often talked in this club almost as much under the felt necessity of repressing my ideas as under the impulse to express them; but to-night I am emancipated. I hav the whole broad future and all its possibilities as my subject, and, as I hav said, you must take your risk of listening to things extravagant. The word "extravagant" means extravagant, or extra-wandering. And the ideal future is exactly the domain which admits of and provokes the utmost extra-vagance.

First let us glance at the ordinary industrial and political conditions in the world as they are certain to be in the immediate or not distant future by simply following on in the track of what now is. Mr. Dawson has given us a strong outline view of the immense business energy of those social forces which are now at work developing the fortunes of humanity. It is as certain as any thing under the sun that these forces will continue to operate to-morrow as they are operating to-day and as they did operate yesterday, only with immensely larger display of power, and correspondingly greater achievements. Our emphatic and peculiar present is sure to be the precursor upon the same lines of action of a still more emphatic and peculiar future. In another twenty-five, fifty, one hundred, two hundred years, this whole world is destined to be flooded by an accession of material wealth. This is the age of mechanics, of chemistry applied in the arts, and of rapid and all-sided invention. All these are new and extraordinary forces which hav sprung up in the world in the last century, and hav only begun as it were to-day, to produce their results. All of them are developing and strengthening with an accelerated ratio. The world will be in a few years glutted, as it were, with production. Prices will decrease on all hands to the verge of the labor cost, and commodities will so abound that wealth will tire of the effort of exclusiv possession. Equitable distribution will be in part devised and will in part force itself upon the world as inevitable. Mankind will thus hav come into the inheritance of a true commonwealth. Poverty is as certain to be abolished in the future as slavery was to be so in the past. All men will be rich as the natural and proper corollary of the freedom of all.

In the political arena the whole world is inevitably to become virtually one nation under some form or other of governmental adjustment. The nations of this world are to-day in the same situation relativly to each other that the American colonies were at the close of the Revolutionary war—feeling their way toward some sort of transitional confederation, which will then in turn merge into a universal nationality.

In the mean time the religions of the world will hav gone through that immense and destructiv criticism which they are in the midst of now; and so much of religious sentiment and expression as shall survive the ordeal will hav consolidated itself into the one universal religion of humanity and the world.

The manners and customs of the world will hav become assimilated and unified on the one hand, while yet admitting of an immensely greater freedom of fashion and individual peculiarity on the other.

Meantime the languages of the world will undergo a similar transmutation. In any event the world must and will hav some universal form of speech. If things were to go on in the merely naturismal order, the new language of the planet would probably be English, on account of its commercial supremacy, gradually drawing into itself, and smelting with its own substance, something from each of all the languages of the world. But opportunely, or just at the right "nick of time," Alwato—the new, scientific, universal language—is discovered, and will come in, first, for the technicality of all the sciences; second, as a general medium of communication among those speaking different languages; and thirdly and ultimately, as the true vernacular of the planet, transcending in excellence all extant languages as much as the railroad transcends the common country road.

Recurring to the political aspects of the future, four great political parties will speedily come to compass the whole earth. Two of these will be parties based upon compulsion, or the power of coercion, and two of them will be based upon the idea of freedom. The two compulsory political parties of the world will be the plutocracy, or the government of wealth, or the rich men, as it is now being rapidly developed in all civilized countries, and which is substantially identical with the laissez faire doctrin of the political economists, Mr. Spencer included; and State Socialism, which will be the transmuted politarchy; politics and government made Socialistic and paternal over the manifold interests of the people.

While these two compulsory and antagonistic forms of the governmental idea will, from now on, be rapidly growing and becoming more and more opposed, and yet more and more cooperativ in constraining the freedom of the individual, the other two social, civic, and semi-political parties, based upon the idea of freedom, will be, in like manner, gaining their seemingly separate and antagonistic, but really co-operativ and unifying, development. These are Divergent Individualism, called technically Anarchism, which simply strives to throw off all governmental control, to relegate the management of all human affairs to the pure, unorganized, unregulated spontaneity of the people themselvs; and Convergent Individualism, technically called Pantarchism, which looks to the voluntary, intelligent, and scientific organization of all human affairs on the basis of a Divergent Individualism already achieved, and which can, therefore, be no other than the orchestration and guided spontaneity of a social world functionating in freedom.

In order that the Pantarchal idea of the future of the planet be realized, other conditions and changes than those called political must hav ensued. It is requisit not only that Universology should be known as a basis and guide, and that Alwato should begin to prevail, not only that all the sciences should be more and more developed and diffused through education, but also that a certain specific change should hav taken place in the minds and characters of men and women themselvs, which cannot, perhaps, be so well described in any other terms as by employing Swedenborg's phrase, "The Opening of the Internal or Spiritual Senses." I will make obvious to you what is meant by this human phenomenon. If an individual with whom the material vision is alone open and ever so acute looks out upon this audience, for example, he simply sees the physical attributes of a certain number of men and women. They are so tall, and so large, so many blonde and so many brunet, with such and such features and dress. He might take the most minute inventory of us all in that sense, and yet see and know nothing more of us whatsoever. If, on the other hand, a person who in addition to all this had his spiritual vision opened were to look out upon this audience, he would take in at once the character of the audience and of individuals in the audience: he would see whether we were intelligent or ignorant, whether we we were practical or cranky, or wise or foolish, generous and noble, or mean and contemptible; he would, in a word, sample us by a simple outlook as rapidly and certainly as a paper merchant would sample varieties of paper, or a clothier different kinds of cloth. So if his internal or spiritual hearing were opened, all this, and a thousand deep things of our natures, would be revealed to him by the tones of our voices so soon as we should speak, and if his internal sense of touch were opened, if he shook hands with any of us, he would know by the feel of the skin, or by subtle emanations from the body of which other men are totally ignorant, a thousand particulars of our spiritual quality and personalities. A world full of people thus ripened in their perceptions would know their true leaders.

Of these subtle powers animals hav much, children hav much, women more than men, and Spiritualists, mediums, and sensitivs more than ordinary people. Just now, however, these occult faculties are being rapidly developed in the world. The world is ripening like a peach. The finer kind of human faculty is rapidly developing. The peach does not ripen suddenly all over. It begins at the point most exposed to the sun, but the new conditions soon diffuse themselvs, and become confluent throughout.

Mr. Dawson readily affirmed that the world of to-day is shrewder intellectually, and more variedly powerful practically, than the world of any previous epoch; but I noticed that when he came to allude to the matter of goodness, he hesitated and halted. Now, I will supplement him. I hav not one particle of hesitancy in affirming that the world was never so good as it is to-day. It would be a monstrosity if the three parts of our nature—Sentiment, Intelligence, and Activity—were not developed coincidently. There was never in the world so much mildness, gentleness, sympathy, charity; in a word, so much goodness as there is to-day. The reason why it seems otherwise is that we are all the time becoming severer critics of ourselvs. Faults that hav been passed over as a matter of course generations ago are now dragged to the light and severely and promptly condemned. When people criticise themselvs, that is the sign that their moral sense has grown vivid. When we come to confess that we are little better than a world full of rascals, you may be pretty sure that there is a growing modicum of virtue among us. When a sinner takes seriously to repentance, he is close on to becoming converted.

To recur to the development of the internal senses, there hav been, probably, no two men who hav lived in the past having a profounder spiritual insight than Emanuel Swedenborg and Charles Fourier. I hav just quoted Swedenborg upon this general subject. Fourier, in a great measure, intuited the whole pantarchal idea. He foresaw for the future a great universal nationality and social order, which he denominated the Omniarchy, of which the head-center was to be the Omniarch. The metropolis, he thought, was to be Constantinople. In coining the words Pantarchy, Pantarch, Pantarchism, etc., I did little more, while saving a syllable, than to correct the hybridity of Fourier's terms, and introduce pure Greek derivations. In that particular I hav very little originality to assert.

Fourier's conception of the social regeneration of mankind involved, and was virtually based upon, two immensely significant principles—they, too, virtually, branches of one principle—first, Attractiv Industry, and second, Passional Attraction. Under the head of Attractiv Industry, he propounded the wonderful thought that all the work of the world will be converted into play, and be performed with delight, so soon as everybody should be helped to do just what he or she most loves or desires, with all the necessary opportunity, conditions, and appliances supplied.

By Passional Attraction he meant that these immense and seemingly contradictory bundles of emotions, passions, and desires, which constitute you and me and all of us, will arrange themselvs spontaneously—and as certainly and truly as gravitation controls the planets—into a grand and harmonious social order, as wonderful as a great musical symphony, so soon as conditions of perfect individual freedom are supplied, and the right social adjustments provided.

Imagin, then, this whole world artistically and splendidly reorganized and, as it were, architecturally completed, or, as our witty Western friends would say, "finished, fenced in, and painted." Suppose every acre of this planet cultivated and embellished as if it pertained to a garden or park, every individual and family housed in a palace, education and enlightenment universally diffused, etc., we then come to the question, What more and beyond?

Aren't, with all this, things going to become a little monotonous? Will not this plethora of good things begin to stale upon us? Remember that in the mean time this world is virtually shrinking in size. We shall be running quite around it, probably, in twenty-five days. Every part and parcel of it will hav become as familiar as a cow pasture. Things will be getting altogether too familiar and trite. I am reminded of what happened with a certain lady, now in this audience, who was engaged in a Sunday-school. The question was propounded to the class, What the children wished her to talk about? One little fellow said, "Tell us about God." Another little boy, still smaller, some four years of age, straightening up, said, "No; tell us about something else. I know all about God."

The Soudan and the Congo, the heart of Africa and the center of Asia, will hav been covered with omnibuses, railroads and aerial ships, which, however, cannot escape from our atmosphere. There will be no new place to go to. Those great military and expeditionary excursions, which hav furnished such immense stimulation and zest for all the past ages of the race, are beginning to come to an absolute end in this very age. Already there is nothing left on this planet to find except the poles; and we know exactly where they are; we being merely blocked out by the ice.

Would not this social world, artistically completed and filled in with the densest of population which the planet can sustain, be still worse. Like the young fellows in Piccadilly, Bloomsbury, and Fifth avenue, would not the whole people, in some sense, be reduced to the character of "dudes?" How is this alarming possibility to be obviated?

Just at this point Spiritualism steps in and opens out to us new worlds to conquer. Right or wrong in fact, the ideal is an enchanting one. Remember that I am not pledged to the accuracies of science, or even to vraisemblance of probability; it merely lies in my line to tell you what Spiritualism says about the matter. It affirms that there is a fine, permeativ, aromal world intimately allied with, and forming, as it were, a part of this world, but of a different order, and of unlimited dimensions. The term Spiritualism is already used in several senses. It is sometimes applied to our mere ideas, emotions, and fancies. Mr. Wakeman uses the term as freely as I do in that sense, while I am now meaning it in a very different sense. He and I spent a portion of one long session, recently, in settling the best technicalities to express this difference, and we agreed upon the terms Ideal Spiritualism and Entical Spiritualism. It is Entical Spiritualism which I now mean—the assumption of the existence of a distinctly real spiritual world.

See, then, what a fine thing this Spiritualism is to relieve us of our quandary and dilemma. A gentleman (or lady) at his (or her) leisure stretches himself upon the sofa, or leans back and makes himself comfortable in an easy chair, shuts his eyes, and rubs his forehead, and sinks readily away into a subjectiv world, his own internal consciousness; departing from this external world and coming into rapport with that other ghostly world, unlimited by space, immensely variant in character, and satisfactory to the most aspiring ideals. To us standing on the outer side that ghostly world is very tenuous and unreal; but they tell us that for those who enter it, it is as real, more real even than this world, and only different in kind—a world made up in some sort of mere thoughts and emotions, transcending space and time, as do our thoughts and feelings; with motion as swift as thought; and still, in some mysterious way, preserving individuality, memory, and all the essential faculties of the man.

It must be very convenient, this power of a person to step out of his body and stand in his shirt, and look at his flesh and bones as he would at his jacket and pantaloons that he has just cast off, and be able in this deshabille to go gallivanting about the universe.

But apart from these extravagances of Spiritualism, let us come back to the more mundane view; let us cast a glance at the infinity of outlying space and stellar existence around us. When this earth shall hav shrunk to its utmost by our greater acquaintance with it, has become to our feeling, as it is in fact, a mere peppercorn rushing through space, with every acre of surface crowded with population like herrings in a box, it must be to the last degree aggravating to look out upon thousands of worlds filling immensity, most of them many times larger than the earth, and they brought possibly almost within touching distance, to the seeming, by wonderfully improved glasses and telescopes, and yet to be hopelessly and forever shut out from the possibility of emigrating, by the ponderosity of our bodies, and the terrible inhibition of the law of gravity.

Here again Spiritualism comes opportunely to our relief. It tells us that these seemingly solid corporeal bodies of ours are not that at all from the point of view of our spirits or souls—that they are, on the contrary, mere whiffs of vapor, capable at any moment of being dematerialized and dispersed into thin air by mere act of the will, or by some spiritual chemistry which pertains to us all as our inheritance, but which is as yet to most of us utterly unknown; and that again these or similar bodies may be rematerialized and made again to cover the spirit or the soul—which is during all these changes the real man or woman, while the body is no more than the hair and nails which we clip and throw away, and which grow again as they are needed.

If all this be true, then we see our way clear to Planetary Emigration. The individual has only to dematerialize, cast off and disperse his body here, pass as a spirit instantaneously through space to any of the planets, to the sun, to Sirius the Dog-star, Aldebaran, or wheresoever, rematerialize, take up his residence there, enter into business, build cities, make a corner on city lots in Jupiter, speculate in their Wall street, and, in a word, do what he will. He is no longer "cribbed, cabined, and confined." He has found the means of bursting the coil of this planetary limitation and has become a free citizen of the universe.

Perhaps this is a good point to rest at in our imaginary flight into the "ideal future." If you wish to go further and know more, call upon me a year hence and I may hav another budget of suggestions to deliver.

It is Liebig who says that the secret of all those who make discoveries, is that they regard nothing as impossible.

After a solo, "Home, Sweet Home," by Miss Peters, the audience were dismissed.

THE NEW-BORN SOUL.

BY COURTLANDT PALMER.

Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again.—JOHN iii, 7. Those who can read the signs of the times read in them that the Kingdom (Republic) of Man is at hand.—W. KINGDON CLIFFORD.

Of yore, as realities,
Spirits, in dreams, over slumber-land stole;
From such idealities—
Deemed personalities—
Fancy has fondly created the soul;

Yea, as an entity
Graspless and ghostly, a vision-made man,
A phantom identity,
Bodied nonentity,
Wafted to heaven when ended life's span.

But heaven's locality,
Vanished its bounds, to the boundless dilates—
So, thought's totality
Universality
Sheds in the mind and the soul re-creates.

Thus, from past wandering,
Home to man's self-hood his soul has returned
Freed from vain pondering,
Zeal no more squandering,
Strong in the strength for which long it has yearned.

The soul a reflector is,
Casting the image of sky and of earth;
No more a specter is,
But the perfecter is,
Pointing the path unto worthiest worth.

The soul is a trinity,
Intellect, will, and affection in one;
This man's affinity
Is to divinity,
This is the sainthood by manhood outdone.

So now the role of man
In his own manhood on earth shall be played;
So now the soul of man
Finds the true goal of man
Heavenly realms by this world overweighed.

The soul, in humility,
Turns to the infinit, rev'rent with awe,
But sees the sterility,
Feels the futility,
Godhead to limit in limits of law;

And yet it potential is;
Stars are its chariots, space its domain,
Thought its essential is,
Truth its credential is,
Science its symphony, Man its refrain.

The soul of HUMANITY
Is the good gained, the bad quelled through all time;
From dead Christianity,
New-risen sanity,
Saves us baptized in this race-soul-sublime.

Thus in a unity
'Midst nature's processes man will be found;
From such community
Free opportunity
Flows for earth's children in brotherhood bound.

By art beatified,
Roused by the good and redeemed by the true,
Life by love ratified,
Through duty gratified,
Such is the soul sweetest service to strew.

Oh, the nobility,
Ever with heroes and martyrs to stand!
Strong the stability,
Sweet the tranquillity,
Ransomed by hope in earth's Eden-made land.

Taken such attitude,
Souls so attempered attain the divine;
Widened faith's platitude
By wisdom's latitude,
Things of the spirit the realest things shine.

Achieved this morality,
Woman and man their completeness hav won;
Abased animality,
Crowned feminality,
"The woman-soul leadeth us upward and on."

And so when the birth of us
Shall to the death of our bodies giv place,
Then all the worth of us,
Freed from the earth of us,
Deathless shall liv in the life of the race.

Holiday Celebrations.

It was a very wise thing in the Liberals to celebrate Decoration Day under the name of "The New Festival of the Dead." It remains now for them to universalize Independence Day, or the Fourth of July. This government was born of the brains of Liberals, and whether Jefferson or Paine wrote the Declaration of Independence, it was the work of a Freethinker, and as such should receive the constant encomiums of the Liberal speakers and the Liberal press. Independents' Day should be added to the list of Liberal holidays. It should in no wise be considered a national or local holiday merely, but should be celebrated by Liberals in every part of the world without regard to nationality. It would be a grand thing if our Liberal meetings were called in reference to some appropriate day, as the Fourth of July. The Liberal League, now that it is likely to take a second thought, and confine its attention strictly to the purposes for which it was originated, could very properly recommend a list of Liberal holidays, of which Independents' Day should be one. Nothing else can be done, as you hav already so wisely said, that will hav a tendency to so quickly and permanently popularize the Liberal movement as the adoption of appropriate holidays and appropriate holiday exercises. Care must be taken not to make the number of such days so great as to prevent their general adoption and celebration. The manner in which they are to be observed must not be so pedantic or somber as to dampen the fresh, vigorous spirit of youth. At the gatherings thus occasioned the Liberals will learn to know each other and to bear the weight of Christian observation. They will also open up channels through which Liberal literature will freely circulate. Let us therefore hav our days for rejoicing. LIBERTA.

New Books.

LEGENDS OF LEMARS, AND OTHER POEMS. By H. C. Tripp, Lemars, Iowa. Price 10 cents.

These poems, it appears by the preface, were written for the author's amusement, and published for the gratification of friends. Both objects having been achieved, we are willing, for one, that the matter should rest.

THE INDEPENDENT PULPIT. Volume I. James D. Shaw Editor and Proprietor, Waco, Texas. Mr. Shaw forgets to state price.

A collection of the first year's issue of the Independent Pulpit bound in paper. Contains very many interesting articles, editorial and contributed, and will save the subscribers the trouble of binding their own copies, which can thus be disseminated to the advantage of Freethought.

THE BIBLE: WHAT IS IT? By J. D. Shaw, editor of the Independent Pulpit. Price 25 cents. Sold at this office.

Mr. Shaw is an energetic, capable writer, and in his little pamplet has condensed many of the strongest points made by ancient and modern scholarship against the inspiration and divinity of the Bible. He proceeds much in the same manner as Paine and Kelso, and makes his points as plainly apparent. The book is one more stout club with which to trounce Bible believers, and if wielded vigorously will leave its mark.

THE AMERICAN MONTHLY. A new magazine devoted to the free discussion of Literature and Science, Politics and Religion. Yearly subscription $4. Single numbers 35 cents.

The June number has a very interesting table of contents, comprising a paper on "Commercial Freedom a Right and a Benefit," by H. K. Smith. "What Our Tariff is Doing," by Van Buren Denslow, a high tariff man. "William Shakspere's and Francis Bacon's Scrap Books," "Little Nan," "Some Presidential Problems," a story, and other essays.

THE POPULAR FAITH UNVEILED. By H. J. Hardwicke, M.D. Published by the author in England.

A thorough and radical exposure of Christianity; where, in the opinion of the author, it came from, and where it is going. The historical evidences for Christianity are carefully examined; the system is compared with Brahmanism, Osirianism, Mithraism, Neo-Platonism, and other "classical mythologies;" the Bible is pulled to pieces in a scholarly and effectiv manner, and the movement of the church toward Rationalism fully exploited. It is a strong book by a skilful writer, and if we may judge by the number of titles after his name, one of eminence in the medical profession of England.

MAN: WHENCE AND WHITHER. By Richard B. Westbrook. D.D., LL.B., author of "The Bible: Whence and What," and "Marriage and Divorce." Price $1. Sold here to accommodate our Theistic friends.

Mr. Westbrook is not a Christian; neither is he a Freethinker. He is a Theist who has a God—much like Spencer's Unknowable—back of all phenomena; who rejects evolution along with the Bible, and is to all intents and purposes a religious guerrilla. The book is the best presentation of the peculiar theology held by the Theists that has come under our notice, and we hav laid it aside for the purpose of again calling attention to its fallacies—for it is full of wrong statements, illogical reasoning, and absurd dogmatism. Yet Judge Westbrook is such a courteous, scholarly gentleman that his accession to the ranks of Freethought would be a gain of great magnitude.

SCIENCE VS. THEOLOGY, a Practical Treatis on the Nature, Laws, and Properties of Matter. By Charles W. Coker. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 75 cents. Sold by Denny & Co., 418 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

The book sets forth Mr. Coker's theory of the formation of the earth and solar system; why the earth turns on its axis; why it is driven around its orbit around the sun; why the tides ebb and flow; why the Mississippi runs up hill; why the magnetic needle points north and south, why it varies; the cause of the gulf streams, all storms, thunder, lightning, volcanic fires, earthquakes, and every other meteoric phenomenon witnessed by man on the face of the globe; the origin of all gods, angels, devils, and their worships, and all religious creeds; the great Bible God, Jehovah; how the Lord of Hosts was captured on the battle-field, and kept from the Jews twenty years; with numerous other topics, and the religious faith of the author.

THOUGHT GERMS FOR THINKERS. By R. F. Judson, Kalamazoo, Mich.

About such thoughts as an advanced Christian who had read heretical and humanitarian works would be apt to think. Mr. Judson is opposed to theology, but makes the mistake common to many large-hearted people brought up Christian of alleging Christianity to be love, liberty, and human equality, instead of a system of supernatural religion. A man who has such indefinit ideas of language as to make this mistake is not competent, however good thoughts he may think, to throw much light on the burning questions of the day. One of his "Thought Germs" is that "the proper idea of God is that of the boundless, the eternal, the unmeasured and unmeasurable, in whom all things move and hav their being; recognized by thought, by spirit, never comprehended, but forever incomprehensible to human understanding." Which jargon is evidently the result of studying Presbyterianism, orthodox Spiritualism, and Herbert Spencer. The senselessness of trying to define the indefinable seems not to hav occurred to Mr Judson. There are good thoughts in the book, but the foregoing is not among them.

THE CO-OPERATIV COMMONWEALTH IN ITS OUTLINES; An exposition of Modern Socialism. By Laurence Gronlund. Price $1. Sold at this office.

For those desirous of studying Socialism, to which, it is alleged, the political forces of the times are tending; of knowing just what the social school of philosophers want and how they propose to get it; the reasoning by which they convince themselvs of the righteousness of their demands and the unrighteousness of those who differ with them, this book is as good as can be obtained. Probably no book was ever published that did not contain truth and error in unequal admixture, and this is no exception. It has a large share of both. An author who lays it down authoritativly that Henry George has buried Malthus and his facts must certainly be admitted to be a partisan. But that is of slight moment compared to another—the fundamental principle of the book; that is, that it is "the state that givs us all the rights we hav." It is the individual in whom dwell all rights to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," limited only by the equal rights to the same of others. The state is, or should be, the individual's agent in securing those rights, and seeing to it that the strong do not encroach upon the weak. If the state givs rights, it can also take rights, and a government of that kind administered with all the skill, justice, and philanthropy mankind will evolute into in the next five hundred years, would not be a desirable governmental investment. The sins of our present government is that it takes rights from the people and givs them to individuals. It would be no nearer justice to take from individuals and giv to the people, calling themselvs the state.

But if the "Co-operativ Commonwealth" will do half the enthusiastic Mr. Gronlund promises it shall do for woman, for proper education of the young, and their training in morals; for the relief of the ineffectiv and vicious incapables who are now a burden supported in alms-houses and jails, some of the weaknesses of the system might be borne with until they corrected themselvs. If Mr. Gronlund could only get the people of some small state like Rhode Island to test the scheme, it would be well worth the while of the rest of the United States to pay the cost of the experiment.

NINETEENTH CENTURY CATECHISM. Also a lecture entitled, "Civilization the Child of Freethought." By Frank Greene, of Liberal, Mo. Price 25 cents. Sold here.

Here we hav the misdeeds of Christianity, some medieval and and modern history, the Materialistic philosophy, and an advertisment of the town of Liberal put into categorical shape and prepared for children's digestion by simple and plain language. Mr. Greene is a vigorous writer, as the readers of the Liberal know, and has put much vivacity into his present work. Take the following from pages 15–16:

Q. Do all Christians take their Bible medicin straight?
A. Yes. All but the mongrels.
Q. Are mongrels plentiful?
A. Yes. They are by far the most numerous.
Q. How do you distinguish the mongrels from the genuin Christians?
A. By observing their conduct, and comparing it with what their Bible teaches. Instead of selling what they hav, and giving to the poor, they invariably keep all they've got, and gobble as much more as possible.
Q. Where do Christians look for evidence in support of their religion?
A. To cemeteries and epitaphs. They are continually referring to the dying words of some general or statesman who never made theology a study.
Q. Do Infidels reject this testimony?
A. Yes. Infidels are acquainted with the laws of nature and know that dying is as natural as being born. They hav no confidence in the statements of those who are scared into saintship. These death-bed confessions are forced, and unreliable. They are usually made by those who are unable to do anything else.
Q. What is the object of Sunday-schools, throughout Christendom?
A. Sunday-schools hav for their prime object the collecting of pennies from children. They are nurseries, calculated to teach children not to think, and are largely successful.
Q. What becomes of the money collected from Sunday-school children?
A. It goes into a fund for missionary purposes managed in such a manner as to consume ninety-nine cents out of every dollar collected, in getting the other cent to the cannibal.
Q. What is a cannibal?
A. A cannibal is one of God's creatures with a mouth and appetite for missionaries. He is a man eater, with no interest in Jesus.

The book is full of as good hits as the foregoing, and can hardly fail to afford amusement and instruction to the purchaser.

Acts of Barnabas.

"This book," says the translator (1870) "has more an air of truth about it than any of the others. There is not much extravagance in the details, and the geography is correct, showing that the writer knew Cyprus well."

The writer of the book says of himself:

"I, John, accompanying the holy apostles Barnabas and Paul, being formerly a servant of Cyrillus the high priest of Jupiter, but now having received the gift of the holy spirit through Paul and Barnabas and Silas, who were worthy of the calling and who baptized me at Iconium."

But according to the canonical Acts, John, surnamed Mark, did not go to Iconium. Hence it is supposed to be a mistake for Jerusalem; especially as a little further on, where the writer says, "I remained at Iconium many days," one manuscript has "Jerusalem," and adds, "And we came to Antioch," i. e., in Syria.

John informs us that after his baptism he was told in a vision that his name should be changed to Mark.

He describes in a few words the mission to Cyprus, agreeing with the account in Acts xiii, until they came to Perga of Pamphylia, when the two stories differ materially. In Acts we are told that John left the apostles in Perga and went to Jerusalem. In John's own account he says he stayed two months in Perga, when he wished to go West, but the holy spirit did not allow him. Therefore he turned, and having heard that the apostles were in Antioch (of Pisidia) he went to them there.

Here he found Paul in bed from the fatigue of the journey, and offended at him for his conduct in Pamphylia. Nevertheless John ministered to the apostles, though afraid to come near to Paul. Three Sabbath days were spent there, and during this time John sought Paul's forgivness on his knees, but without avail. The apostle's great grievance was on account of John's "keeping several parchments in Pamphylia."

When they were about to leave Antioch the missionaries could not agree where to go next. Barnabas besought Paul to go to Cyprus and "oversee his own in his village." Lucius entreated him to take the oversight of his city, Cyrene. (It does not appear from Acts that Lucius of Cyrene was with Paul and Barnabas at any time on a missionary journey.) But Paul had a vision in his sleep calling upon him to hasten to Jerusalem. Thus there was great contention. Barnabas wished John to continue with them as a servant. Paul refused to hav him, but was willing to let Barnabas take John and go his own way. At last they sought divine guidance in prayer, and after much groaning and weeping Paul fully approved of Barnabas's determination to go to Cyprus with John. Barnabas fell down at Paul's feet and and said, "I go to Cyprus and hasten to be made perfect; for I know that I shall no more see thy face, O Father Paul." And Paul said, "The Lord stood by me this night saying: Do not force Barnabas not to go to Cyprus, for there it has been prepared for him to enlighten many; and do thou also, in the grace that has been given thee, go to Jerusalem to worship in the holy place, and there it shall be shown thee where thy martyrdom has been prepared."

This separation of Paul and Barnabas is the same that is described in Acts xv, 36–41. But the two accounts differ in the following essential particulars:

Acts of Barnabas.	Acts of the Apostles.
The separation occurs at Antioch in Pisidia.	The separation occurs at Antioch in Syria.
It was during their first missionary journey (Acts xiii; marginal chronology, A.D. 45).	It was just before their second missionary journey (Acts xv; marg. chron., A.D. 53).
Paul was directed by the Lord in a vision to hasten to Jerusalem.	He traveled through Syria and Cilicia to Derbe and Lystra, and thence to Macedonia.
Lucius of Cyrene was present as a fellow-missionary.	Lucius of Cyrene was not sent on either journey.

The rest of this book relates to Barnabas, but as it seems to be partly historical, we deem it important enough to giv an abstract of the story.

Barnabas and John embarked for Cyprus in the port of Laodicea. This shows that the separation of the two apostles was at Antioch in Syria, which was about forty miles from Laodicea; Antioch in Pisidia was five hundred miles distant. Adverse winds drove the vessel far out of its course. They were compelled to stop at several landing-places. At Corasium (perhaps Corcyrus in Cilicia) they concealed themselvs lest some one should discover that Barnabas had separated from Paul. A storm detained them three days at the island of Pityusa (north of Crete), where they were entertained by a pious man named Euphemus, whom with his house Barnabas instructed in the faith. At Anemurium (in Cilicia) Barnabas converted two Greeks by promising to put on them clothing which would never become soiled. Having baptized them, he clothed them, one with his own robe and the other with John Mark's. The happy converts gave the apostle money, which he straightway distributed to the poor. As the ship was about to sail for Cyprus, one of the seamen, named Stephanus, wanted to go along, but Barnabas would not permit him.

At night they sailed across to Cyprus, landing at Cromycita. Here they were entertained at the house of Timon and Ariston, temple servants. Timon had a fever, which they cured by laying their hands upon him and invoking the Lord Jesus. Barnabas also cured the sick by laying upon them the documents he had received from Matthew, "a book of the word (or voice) of God, and a narrativ of miracles and doctrins." (Query: Was this the Hebrew gospel?)

At the next town, Lapithus, an idol festival was being celebrated in the theater. Being forbidden to enter the city, they journeyed over the mountains to Lampadistus, Timon's nativ town. Here they were entertained by Heracleius of Tamasus, then on a visit to his relations. Him Barnabas recognized, having met him at Citium with Paul, where his name was changed at baptism to Heracleides. They ordained him bishop of Cyprus.

Journeying over the mountain called Chionodes (i. e., snowy), they came to Old Paphos, where they found Rhodon, a temple servant, who became a believer and accompanied them. They met, coming from Paphos, Barjesus, the Jew (alias Bar-Suma, the sorcerer), who recognized Barnabas. Barnabas did not go into Paphos (i. e. the chief town, called New Paphos), and so they proceeded to Curium.

At Curium (perhaps Curtium) an abominable foot-race was being performed by naked men and women. Barnabas rebuked the wicked city, and the western part of it fell, killing many people; the rest fled to the sacred temple of Apollo. As the missionaries drew near to the temple, they were opposed by a great multitude of Jews at the instigation of Barjesus. So they had to spend the night outside the city under a tree.

Next day they visited a village where Aristoclianus dwelt—a leper who had been cleansed at Antioch, sealed as a bishop by Paul and Barnabas, and sent to his village because there were many Greeks there. This village bishop entertained the missionaries for one day in a mountain cave.

Thence they came to Amanthus on the south coast. Here Barjesus had got the start of them, having gained over the Jews. They were not allowed to enter the city, but were taken in for an hour by a widow woman of eighty, who lived outside and did not worship idols. As they departed they shook the dust off their feet over against the temple in the mountain, where a multitude of low women and men were pouring libations.

Traveling through desert places they next came to Citium; but as there was a great uproar at the hippodrome and no one received them, they rested an hour at the gate and then sailed to Salamis.

They landed in the islands where there was a place full of idols, and a high festival was being celebrated. Here they found Bishop Heracleides again, and gave him instructions about setting up churches. Having gone into the city, they went to the synagog where Barnabas unrolled the gospel he had received from Matthew, and began to teach the Jews.

After two days Barjesus arrived with other Jews, and having brought together a multitude of Jews, they laid hold of Barnabas and bound him, wishing to take him before the governor of Salamis. But having learned that a pious Jebusite, a kinsman of Nero, had come to Cyprus, they did not take the apostle before the governor, but dragged him from the synagog to the hippodrome, and having gone out of the city, they burnt him with fire so that even his bones became dust. Then they gathered his dust in a cloth, intending to sink it with a wrapping of lead in the sea; but John, Timon, and Rhodon stole it away in the night and secreted it in a cave with the documents, where they also hid themselvs. But the Jews having discovered their hiding-place, they fled to another cave near the village of the Ledrians. Here they remained three days, until the Jews gave up the pursuit of them, when they went to the village of Limnes, whence they sailed to Alexandria in an Egyptian ship. There the writer says he remained preaching what he had been taught by the apostles, who baptized him and changed his name to Mark by the water of baptism.

We are inclined to believe there is a foundation of truth in this account of Barnabas, and possibly that John Mark wrote it originally. But it has been much corrupted, and the name Nero has been interpolated. This book is known to hav existed as early as A.D. 478, when the body of Barnabas (who was probably put to death and perhaps burnt to ashes about 40 B.C.) was found in Cyprus.

The ministry of the apostle seems to hav been short and unsuccessful. Twice he journeyed rapidly through his nativ island, making but few converts, and before he had completed his second missionary journey he was murdered by a Jewish mob instigated by Barjesus.

Obituary.

Mr. John P. Jewett, the original publisher of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," died on Wednesday morning, May 14th, at his home in Orange, N. J.

Mr. Jewett was born at Lebanon, Maine, August 16, 1814, and was in the 70th year of his age. He leaves a widow and four children.

Mr. Jewett was a son of the Rev. Paul Jewett, a nativ of Rowley, Mass. He went to Salem when quite a youth, finding employment in the bookstore and bindery of John M. Ives, where he worked his way up from the position of office boy to that of a partner, the firm name then being Ives & Jewett, and continued in that business for several years after Mr. Ives's withdrawal, under his own name, and as John P. Jewett & Co. He removed to Boston about 1849, where he enlarged his operations, and, in 1852, became the original publisher of Mrs. Stowe's world-renowned "Uncle Tom's Cabin" (which reached the enormous sale of 360,000 in this country alone); "The Lamplighter," "Isaac T. Hopper," "Beecher's Lectures to Young Men," the superb steel-plate engraving, "Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress," and many other popular works. He was an activ member, from its organization, of the Antislavery Society of New England, also a member of the Boston Mozart Club for nearly twenty years, being passionately fond of good music; his favorit instrument was the violin. He also held various positions of trust, being trustee of a prominent Boston bank for several years among the number. He was a warm personal friend of William Lloyd Garrison, Hon. Charles Sumner, Governor Andrew, Wendell Phillips, ex-Governor Rice, Judge Sewall, Henry Ward Beecher, Hon. Elizur Wright, John G. Whittier, D. M. Bennett, and many other prominent characters.

He was in his later years a stanch Liberal, and when Mr. Bennett was living delighted in calling upon him and discussing the condition and spread of Freethought.

WHEN a minister falls, the whole community should put on sackcloth and ashes, not for the minister's agony—for that is deserved—but for itself.—Advocate.

Nay, Brother Buckley, it is not the community whose griefs we should bewail. It has been observed that when a minister falls there is usually some ruined woman left in the neighborhood, toward whom the sympathy of society can with appropriateness exhale.

Waifs and Wanderings.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE LAW AND THE GOSPEL.

"There is no doubt of it," said the judge. "She has always worn this?"

"Always," answered Bolton. "It was with her when she was brought to me. It seemed of no value; a mere charm, and I let it remain. I made no inquiries, for it was useless. No doubt the trader picked her up among wreckers. They do sometimes. I have no doubt she is your child. Her resemblance to this picture is perfect."

"How blind I was!" cried the judge. "They are alike. The eyes, the forehead, the lips, the whole beautiful face. I gave this to Leonora myself. I made it like a charm of common material outside, but rich within of most precious jewels. See how they sparkle and fling their light upon her features. Thou hast worn this not knowing its hidden wealth, a secret from all until this fateful moment. It was a charm indeed, meager in the eyes of the world, but with a heart of fire. Ah, my child, how welcome to my old age thou art, like a fresh morning! You bring my happiness back again, my youth, my love. Oh, those days of delight! I met her in Cuba beneath the soft, sweet skies, whose luminous depths shone in her own resplendent eyes. I met her amid the flowers; and the flowers made bright our marriage day. The months flew by, and we set sail for home. All was lovely. The sea mirrored our happiness as it flashed and rippled in the summer's breeze. The moon shed its radiance on our swift path. We watched beneath its orb the dancing waves, whose mingling crests seemed to weave for us a path of glory. Suddenly the ship struck a hidden rock. All was confusion. I found myself, I hardly know how, with my wife and child tossing amid waters with only a plank. We floated on. A tempest arose, and we were swept apart. Helpless I drifted to safety. You were rescued, it seems, also, but doomed to a life of toil, of slavery. How you must have suffered. It is over now. I have wealth, and through your mother there is a vast fortune which is yours by right. What is that, however, to the joy of knowing that you are my own child, my own child?"

It was an astounding transformation. It was like a story out of the Arabian Nights' entertainment, as if the lamp of Aladdin had flashed its wealth at their feet, and opened the fountains of romance and joy. The poor wronged woman was crowned with a queenly luster. No longer was she the unknown, the unrecognized, but the diademed. Worth had received its fitting adornment. It sometimes does happen that the inward and the outward touch with harmonious excellence.

In the midst of this happy moment, the rasping voice of Sandy was heard, like the hiss of a serpent in the midst of a symphony.

"This discovery does not debar my right. I claim my wife."

The judge turned upon him with blazing eyes, and raised his hand as if to strike.

"You yourself so decided," continued Sandy.

"Alas, it is so!" said the judge. "We are in the clutches of the law. You will not insist?"

"Of course he will not," said Bolton. "Things are changed now. I will settle the matter. It won't take long. Come, Sandy, a few words in this room."

Bolton and Sandy withdrew for a friendly conference. Bolton expected to pay a big price, but he was ready to do so in view of the vast fortune of Amy.

"This is an unexpected turn of affairs," said Bolton. "I suppose you feel like coming in for a share of the spoils."

"Of course I do," said Sandy, rubbing his hands delightedly, and grinning almost from ear to ear. "I am a most lucky fellow."

"That you are. This will make you a rich man."

"Yes, it will."

"Of course we must give up the marriage. Amy is a prize now. Harry could not find a richer wife, or one more honorable in descent."

"I am exactly of your opinion," said Sandy. "She is a prize indeed."

"You see the necessity, then, of letting the marriage be annulled. I will pay you ten thousand dollars."

"You are very kind," answered Sandy, "but I can not accept that."

"Do you want more, you rascal? Don't presume, or I may kick you out."

"You can do so, but that don't destroy my rights."

"Rights founded on a lie! Ha, ha!"

"No matter. The lie is accepted, and the marriage is legal."

"You've got me, Sandy. Well, I double up. Take twenty thousand and make yourself scarce?"

"I won't take twenty thousand, nor a hundred thousand," retorted Sandy. "I claim the marriage."

"You fool, you!" thundered Bolton. "What do you mean, you insignificant puppy?"

"I mean that I am the husband of Amy Bolton, née Arno, and I intend to maintain my position. You can't buy me off, and you can't kick me off. I am as good as you."

"You are a thief and perjurer," cried Bolton. "I could have you sent to prison."

"And go with me, too," answered Sandy. "Didn't you swear to the same lie I did? You, too, are a perjurer, as big a villain as I am, and I defy you."

Bolton was astounded. This tool of his who for years had obeyed his slightest wish, had done his meanest errands, his most degrading work, who was the most subservient of sycophants, now mocked him, and boldly challenged his will as if an equal. He seized Sandy by the throat.

"Let go!" cried he. "You are no longer my master."

"Nevertheless I'll kill you," burst forth Bolton savagely.

"Not yet," said Sandy, twisting himself free, and fronting his adversary with nimble strength. "Beware!"

Bolton was thoroughly amazed. He was confronted by his very self—by a man as devilish, as daring, and as unscrupulous. He was utterly unprepared for such a dramatic uplifting of the curtain of Sandy's inner nature and iron purpose. The slave was now in a position of mastery, and he showed himself capable of using his power with unflinching energy.

"This is nonsense," said Bolton, after a pause, with forced calmness. "Let us be friends."

"Certainly. I don't care to fight. That's not my way; but I will not yield."

"Why not?"

"Why not? A pretty question for you to ask. Would you give it up? I guess not, and that's my fix. I look out for number one. I don't care for anybody else."

"Think of what I have done for you, and be a grateful dog," said Bolton.

"Dog! yes, I have been a dog, but for my own purposes. I have let you spit upon me, but I did so because it was for my own interest. I was the under dog then, and stood it. I'm not now. I've got my chance now, and I shall keep it. It was for Sandy when I let you abuse me, and it's for Sandy now when I'm at the top of the heap, with a fortune in my grasp of which an emperor might feel proud.

"You intend to keep that fortune?"

"I do. It's mine by law. It does not belong to Amy but to me, her husband. I can use it as I see fit. The woman is nothing. Man is the head. Do you think I shall yield one particle of that wealth? I'll do just what you would do in the same circumstances. I have learned my lesson well of you. You will find me an apt student."

Bolton glared at Sandy and clenched his fists until the blood ran. He was caught in his own trap and he suffered the very agonies of hell. He had originated this very scheme, had paid Sandy five hundred dollars to carry it through. Now Amy was an alluring prize, and to be compelled to yield to Sandy, whom he thoroughly despised, and that too by reason of his own criminal subornation; well, for the time being, what he felt was equivalent to a good hanging.

They fronted each other like two gladiators. Bolton was at his wits' end. Sandy had the advantage. He was backed up by law; he could appeal to the brute force of civilized society.

"You stick to it, then?" said Bolton.

"I do," replied Sandy, "and you must be my ally, as I have been yours heretofore. I have stuck to you through thick and thin, now you must do the same for me. I have hated you and served you. Hate me as much as you will, but you must serve me."

Bolton knew it. He was compelled now to crouch before the man that he had kicked and spit upon. He must lift to a dazzling fortune one whom he considered only a dog. He must cheat his own son. He must deprive himself of honor and glory.

"Your are a crafty villain, indeed," said he.

"I acknowledge that, and we can mutually confess," answered Sandy. "We are each of us such mighty villains that we must keep up the partnership."

For the first time in his life Bolton was ashamed of his wrong-doing. He began to see that it didn't pay. No man is so sharp a devil but that sometimes he finds a sharper one to beat him at his own game.

"There's no use of prolonging the interview," said Sandy. "You know what is best for yourself, and I haven't the slightest doubt but that you'll do it. Come on."

Sandy marched triumphantly forth. Bolton meekly followed. The master and slave had changed places.

"Sandy declines to surrender his rights," spoke Bolton. "You must make the best terms with him you can."

"Cannot the case be re-opened?" asked Harry.

"Not without new evidence," said Sandy.

"Would you not testify, Amy?" said Harry.

"Not if I must take the oath as declared," answered Amy.

"Will you not allow her simple testimony, now that you know she is your own child?" pleaded Harry to the judge.

There was a vast struggle in the judge's breast. It was indeed the terrific struggle between truth and his sense of duty—a conflict hitherto inconceivable to a man of his temperament.

The truth and one's conception of duty do not always go together. They will clash sometimes in the immense complexities of human life. Truth is both relative and absolute, while duty is only relative; and when the absolute truth comes burning into the soul it shivers at times the sense of duty, and for the moment the man is a wreck. He has no compass, until from the new conditions the sense of a new and higher duty arises.

The judge buried his face in his hands. He was shaken as by a whirlwind. The wide realm of truth outside of his personal experience flashed upon him its intolerable radiance, and his being seemed utterly dissolved, smitten by excess of light unto midnight darkness. No star seemed to guide his way. He could only grope his way back to the old landmarks. That was his only safety. Otherwise he would have been insane.

"I can only decide as I did," he answered.

"Neither will yield; falsehood is triumphant," broke in Harry. "Was there ever such an utter wreck of life because each must cling to the best? If they had a little less conscience then might falsehood be destroyed; now it cannot be."

The greatest discord of life is not of truth with error, but of truth with truth. When will the hidden harmony roll forth?

"Is there no way to annul this marriage?" asked Bolton.

"No," answered Sandy. "I am a perfectly moral man. You can't touch me on that point. There's only one ground of divorce, infidelity, and not a word can be declared against my purity."

Of course not. He was a perfect icicle. He was too big a villain to have a particle of genuine passion. He was a communicant in the Methodist church, and always on his good behavior. His reputation was the very reverse of his character.

"I scorn you and leave you!" cried Amy.

"Do as you choose, but the money and the child are mine. Over them I have absolute control."

"It cannot be," cried Amy.

"It is so," said the judge. "The property and the offspring belong to the husband. So says the law."

"It is an inhuman law. It enthrones a hideous wrong," answered Amy.

The judge was silent. The logic of the law was at variance with his sense of justice, but he dared not think. For him there was no solution of the grim puzzle.

Sandy's all-remorseless cunning was in the ascendant. The net of the law was over the mother and child. They might appeal to eternal principles, but what was the use? That would involve war with society, and that was destruction. Amy would do it in the sublime independence of her womanhood, but she could not take Bessie with her. On Bessie society had laid its enormous brutal clutch and claimed her, the victim of its so-called accumulated wisdom of the ages. Amy, strong for herself, was helpless for her own child, and hence the chains were thrown about her own imperious spirit.

It was an awful dilemma—father, child, daughter held in woeful bondage—the inevitable outcome of the rigidity of law. There can be no absolute standard of its thousandfold application. Law, like poetry, should be evermore a new creation—a ceaseless fountain of truth, adapting itself to the million fresh issues of human life. Crystallize law and you make despotism. Law to be eternally just must be flowing like the effluence of the sun-laden air.

Like a northeasterly wind full of sunshine, our dear old friend Stubbs burst into the midst of our unhappy company, unhappy save Sandy, who was indeed a bright and shining light.

"Why, this looks like a funeral," cried Stubbs. "I received the summons, but couldn't come. I I didn't see any use, for I had nothing to say. I'd only been a fifth wheel to the coach, but better late than never. Here I am, dropped in for a morning's call. But it don't look right. I see clouds. Let's have it. Perhaps I can mend matters."

In a few moments the whole situation of affairs was explained.

"It's a strange mess," he said. "The law leads you a wild dance. Thank heaven! there's a way out via to-day's Herald, which I bought on my way up, which contains the latest news, and the last tergiversation of that acme of justice which we call law. Law! why, it's everything by fits, and nothing long, its masks, and faces, an ever-changing panorama. To-day this, to-morrow that. It's a magician's tool, and makes marvelous transformations. It's on both sides, and reconciles opposites. It's a fixity, and it's a fairy. It whisks its magic wand, and lo! it suffers a sea change rich and strange. You can't depend on law any more than you can on a woman's tongue. Yes and no follow each other with such rapidity that you don't know whether the fair one consents or not.

See here, the law says a slave marriage is valid. Valid—yes, says the latest decision of the court, if the parties freely consent to live together after emancipation; but if not, there is no binding, legal compact. The reason is simple enough. While slaves they are things, after emancipation they are persons. According to law, only persons can marry. Things can't marry. Therefore, a slave marriage is not valid in itself; it must be made valid by the actual consent of the parties after they become persons, and are capable of legal choice. Unless Sandy can prove that since the emancipation there has been a full consent to the marriage, he has no claim whatsoever. I think, therefore, he had better vamose."

The newspaper was passed from hand to hand, and the latest interpretation of the law eagerly read. It was a gospel indeed.

Judge Arno was delighted to find that he could get out of the clutches of the law by the law itself.

"I see it now," he declared, "but unless it had been told me I never should have thought of it. It's a shrewd device, but perfectly legitimate. In fact, it's common sense."

"The law and common sense do make a very happy couple occasionally. The trouble is, they don't keep it up. It's a touch-and-go marriage. Sandy, read and see where you stand," cried Stubbs.

Sandy read the decision carefully. He perceived at once that his case was hopeless. Law had put on a new face, and he was no longer master. Nevertheless he was diplomatic. He subsided gracefully. He gave his good wishes to all, and then went. The last heard from him, he was running for Congress on a reform ticket, with every prospect of election. That's the way of the world. There's always opportunity for an enterprising rascal like Sandy. He is by no means a "miserable sinner," notwithstanding his Sabbath-day confessions. Of course Bolton partook of the general happiness. That's the way of the world too. The saint and the sinner are so inextricably mixed that if one is happy the other is happy too. It ought not to be so; only the good should be happy, but the bad are happy likewise. The devil has a multitude of fine things. He shakes hands with the saints over many a victory. It is, however, infinitely better that the good should be rewarded than that the evil should be punished. It is reward, not punishment, that in the end makes things beautiful. No hanging ever yet advanced human welfare.

"Won't Mariar feel good over this?" said Cupples to Bessie as they went arm in arm from the court room. "She was sick a-bed and couldn't come. She'll get well now."

"Yes," said Bessie, while her eyes flashed gloriously and triumphantly. "And the best medicine will be that out of my first pin-money, I shall buy her a new spring bonnet."

"Hurrah!" cried Cupples, "that always did do her good, though it was rather hard on me. I'm glad my baby can foot the bills."

"And trip the light fantastic toe at the same time," answered Bessie. "Here's a kiss and away."

THE END.

Theology and Evolution.

I hav just been reading Rev. Thomas Mitchell's address at the Rochester Convention, and was very much amused at his attempt to prove that all life upon our earth is dependent on the existence of man, and his sketch of the gradual death of all animal life if man were annihilated. He says: "Man is the only animal who clears the land of trees and cultivates the soil, sows seeds, plants fruit-trees, and reaps harvests. There is no account of a race of men so low that they did not do these things, nor of one that did not rear and keep domestic animals. Wild wood trees will grow wherever there is soil enough to sustain any kind of plant; and they will be numerous in proportion to the richness of the soil. No cereal or fruit will grow in dense woods, nor even grass for hay." Then after describing the process of the distribution of food among the lower orders of animal life in Mosaic style, he says: "Let us now suppose the sudden extinguishment of mankind, and that this catastrophe took place in the spring—too early to sow or plant. As a result there would be no harvests reaped that autumn. By the next spring all the domestic animals would hav died of starvation." And then he follows with a short description of the destruction of each stage of animal life, and ends the passage with, "And before the end of ten years the last two of these would meet in deadly conflict, after which the survivor would die of starvation." This is so silly that his "Syllogisms" appear like sensible reading beside it. Who cleared the vast prairies of the West of trees? Surely the soil is rich enough to produce an abundance of vegetation, yet it does not require the intervention of man to prevent the growth of dense forests there, but instead man is using every means in his power to cover a portion of the land with such growth, and our government offers him an inducement to do so, but his efforts are attended with but indifferent success.

Last summer while traveling in northwestern Minnesota, I saw some of these attempts at forest culture. I saw a few little stunted shrubs of eight or ten year's growth, presenting a truly ludicrous appearance. Yet man was trying by every known art to keep them alive until he could obtain full title to the land which the government offered him as an inducement. The land was very fertil, producing an abundance of vegetation in the form of wild grass, and, where under cultivation, as fine fields of wheat as one could wish to see. I saw also a few wild rabbits and numbers of prairie fowl which were said to hav been abundant there at the time of its first settlement, but they are gradually disappearing before the relentless march of man.

Reverend Mitchell has all the fishes die in rotation, beginning with the smaller in our streams and near shore, which, he says, "had fed on vegetable matter washed from the cultivated farms," but seemingly fails to comprehend that our lakes and rivers were filled with an abundance of fishes long before there were "cultivated farms" on our continent (or at least within thousands of miles of them), to supply the "necessary vegetable matter." He has never noticed that these fishes are rapidly diminishing under the merciless destruction of man. By such reasoning as the above he hopes to establish the dogma of creation, and annihilate the "hypothesis" of evolution. Verily, it may be likened unto a flea that kicked an elephant.

Let Us Explode Capital, but Save the Pieces.

The press teems with platforms or political formulas designed to influence the constitution of parties in the next election, which, did it not embrace issues intrinsically of the highest import, would still hav for us the greatest interest, simply because it is the present.

I do not propose here a special criticism on any of these platforms. I only remark that, whether patent or latent, their general issue lies between capital and labor.

Attached by my moral convictions to the interests of labor, I am of that popular majority which, by default of intelligence in the mechanism or management of elections, has hitherto been without representation.

So numerous and powerfnl are the influences which capital is trained to exercise upon the ballot, that the entering wedge of the labor interest can be no other than minority representation. Concerning the methods of arranging this, I hav nothing new to add. Observation, experiment, and reason hav concurred in throwing light upon it. I will but refer in passing to a letter from H. Royer in the Radical Review of Oct. 27, 1883. Keep this issue before the people. Labor's rallying-cry cannot be a general confession of faith, or a program of desiderata de omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis. Its call to the polls has the shriek of a dynamite bomb shell aimed to hit capital right between past and future, exploding it "in pieces sma'," yet without jarring house or store, unless by rap of sheriff for payment of taxes. Nor must it abuse the convenience of lamp-posts under pretext of moral illumination; ça n'ira pas. Socialism, with the ballot, rides like Bacchus in a car drawn by passional lions and tigers. Its progress to the people's promised land depends upon keeping these beasts in good humor with the sympathetic juice of friendship's vine. Let the people once taste the blood of their oppressors, they break loose from the car of state and leave it in the mire.

Instead of methodical, pacific anarchism, we hav disheveled anarchy; mad mobs provoking while they justify the sole appeasing voice of the cannon, and, through military despotism, reëstablishing the orders of privilege. Small as is comparativly the United States standing army, capital controls no less effectivly here than in Europe the fighting material. "Money is the sinew of war."

Years of social and industrial education must elapse while we are unlearning the fallacies of our political superstition, and simplifying government to its first principles in the co-operativ farm and workshop. Meanwhile, it is urgent to loose the heavy yoke of capital from the neck of labor, prostrate in its half-plowed furrow. Let us transfer this yoke to capital, by taxing it in all its forms, real estates and personal, not forgetting government bonds to the extent of a virtually prohibitory tariff for the protection of labor. Assuming the last census as a basis, we may calculate the minimum to be enfranchised from taxation by dividing the total number of dollars at which all properties are estimated by the total number of inhabitants; then apportion the taxes (exclusivly direct) so that beyond the minimum or negativ point, they shall increase in geometrical rates to accumulation. We must also do a little ex post facto business for the benefit of Gould, Vanderbilt & Co., with their foreign coadjutors in land speculation. Bond-holders and other creditors of the United States war debt hav already been overpaid, from the moment when, for the fictitious though actual estimation of interest, we substitute the juster rate based on the annual increase of real values, after deducting the dividend of labor (skill of course included). If we pay such creditors another cent, it will be either from stupidity or else from expediences foreign to justice, and about which I am ignorant.

Next to minority representation comes the land issue. What form of proprietorship, fee simple for the actual cultivator or government lease, shall be adopted in restoring the soil to the people, invalidating all titles except personal occupation and improvement, and frustrating all speculation in the land market?

Should Henry George's scheme prevail, it behooves us to frustrate reproduction of the old abuses, the new titles of lease, and allow of no sub-leasing upon the basis of soil. There will remain a practical approximation to this by the interest paid to capital invested in machinery, depots, etc., but the geometrical ratio tax will here giv co-operativ associations a decisiv advantage over individual capitalists.

There are certain expediences which we, especially in the Freethinkers' wing of the labor party, should forbear to insist upon till we are sure of a majority. It is hard for us to resist the temptation of pressing on the public mind at all times and seasons the necessity of cutting the state loose from the church, yet we cannot ignore the actual predominance of clerical influence over the majority of voters. The labor horse is not yet old and strong enough to bear the Liberal League in the saddle. Its victory is the manifest destiny of common sense, yet it is of secondary order. It must bide its time. Among minor points for instance, however desirable to economize Sunday for elections, I should prejudice any other reform measure by connecting it with this in the minds of my neighbors.

Freethinkers being at present but a small minority of the people, and numbering in their camp many partisans of privilege who sustain capital in the oppression of labor, while on the other hand, the great mass of laborers call themselvs Christian, and are under church influence, it is impolitic, on a point comparativly unimportant and on which it is impossible to conciliate opinions or feelings, to arouse the sleepless dogs of puritan prejudice, or whet the zeal of churchmen against labor's rights. King Capital dethroned and geared in the co-operativ harness, there will be time and chance enough to reform the human understanding upon minor points.

There is another matter vitally important on which I fear that Freethinkers no less than other Americans are too superstitious and rashly inclined to substitute blind faith for reason. I allude to the premature, if not false, confidence of Socialism in its ideal state. What Uncle Sam has been, during the last century, we know pretty well, and between him and Jehovah it has been "pull Dick, pull devil," as regards justice to labor. But in political, as in theological aspirations, everybody makes his god after his own image and then worships it. Will Uncle Sam mend his ways on account of being elected by us road diggers? On that point I confess myself Agnostic. Yet it is to this secular hypothesis of virtue that Socialists would confide the supreme and exclusiv function of money making. What a privilege, and what a temptation to the men who constitute government!

The capitalists want a strong government; they need such to keep labor under foot. They are logical in equipping their government with sword and purse, of which we are the obedient soldiers and the humble fillers. The interests of labor are pacific, not belligerent; and it needs no other money than its own exchange notes. Take from Uncle Sam both sword and purse, make him work for his living like the rest of us, and let privilege content itself with the honors of administrativ wisdom.

Those who believe in the necessity of general governments and their functionaries, may argue that if the latter were not highly paid, they would only hook the more in an underhand way; or else that only rich men would run for office, thus to increase their power and so form a regular titled aristocracy. But I doubt whether the actual abuses of power and place could be exceeded by the poorest knaves if put in office; and as long as the mania for governments continues, there can surely be no harm in trying the economy of substituting honors for dollars in all beyond the average daily wages of laborers.

Abolish the custom house and indirect taxation along with the power of issuing money, otherwise than every citizen is free to pass his note where he can; make the treasury no longer a premium on rascality, and honest men may come to the front.

Any Socialist success achieved through the ballot can be only provisional, like shanties built upon a crust of ice.

The ice of probity, formed under the chill wind of poverty, rapidly melts under the seductiv zephyrs of luxury. Our landgraves and railroad kings complain that the average congressman ruins them in bon bons, bonds, and bonuses.

It is no wonder that the fruges consumere nati hav such a beggarly opinion of Socialism, of that Socialism, I mean, which begs the question of an honest government—rara avis in terris, even since the discovery of the black swan. Yes, an honest government is the petitio principii of modern Socialism, Marxic or Georgic. Hinc illæ lacrymæ.

What guarantees of honesty there can be outside of co-operativ associations, I do not perceive. After a century of treasons, let us get, if we may, a day of honest work out of our government; but I tell you we shall hav to make hay while the sun shines, and with big, black clouds looming on the horizon, we shall hav our hands full of work. The League.

There seems to be a disagreement between the editors of Man. Mr. Leland indorses THE TRUTH SEEKER's position in regard to the League letting side issues alone, while Mr. Wakeman says that of the political platform proposed at the last Congress, "the Liberals hav reason to be proud instead of letting it be overslaughed and forgotten, and we hope to see it not only reprinted and circulated, but used to some purpose before the next canvass is over. Where," he asks, "are those who advocated it so ably before the League?"

To the query we can only say, we do not know. Those who advocated the platform at Milwaukee hav rarely been heard from since, and only one plank created interest enough to cause its discussion. If Mr. Wakeman had said that, in his opinion, the platform is too important to be forgotten, he would hav been nearer the truth, for the importance of the subjects embodied in it is a matter of opinion only, and very wide difference exists among Freethinkers in regard to it.

On the legitimate objects of the League, however, there is perfect unanimity, and no divisions periling the very existence of the body will arise. To show that this is the opinion of nearly all we quote Mr. Wakeman's brother editor. In the same issue in which the query of Mr. Wakeman appears Mr. Leland observes:

"We are glad to know that all our Liberal contemporaries agree substantially; first, that there is pressing need of a National Liberal organization specially devoted to Freethought work and the freedom and enlightenment of the human mind; second, that a strict Freethought platform ought to be adopted and adhered to; third, that the main platform and principles of the League are correct; and fourth, that the action and general administration of the League has been, as the Investigator says, 'as good as could be expected when we consider the means and circumstances.' If thanks are due for clear seeing of the League situation, for considering means and circumstances when measuring results, and for their unanimous agreement that the League should be sustained, then we thank our brother editors most kindly. We also thank them for their appreciation of such work as we hav been able to do in and for it."

MR. MITCHELL.

NEWPORT, MAIN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: To defen principle do I take my pen to address you. I read with d interest your criticism on E. C. Walker's position as stated THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 31st.

Of all the readers of your paper there is not one that sees and admires your ability to defend the cause of liberty more than I do, but, my good brother, let me say to you in all kindness, you cannot sustain yourself against the impregnable position of E. C. Walker.

Wendell Phillips once said, "God did not put me in the world to free slaves, but to do right." Blot out the word "God," and the sentence is a grand one. Our business as the true saviors of the world is not to fear for compacts made by fallible men, but to contend for a principle, if in doing so we stand alone. The League has already compromised too much, and a few more such compromises will ruin it forever. There is no man in this country that stands on a more impregnable foundation than E. C. Walker, and history will certainly prove that my statement is correct. SEWARD MITCHELL.

As Mr. Walker's "position" is to load the League with a large number of side issues, having no connection with or relevancy to its charter objects, we imagin the impregnability is a debatable matter. It seems to us, also, a question of wisdom. The League was founded to accomplish certain definit purposes. It was not organized to work for prohibition or anti-prohibition laws; nor as a Socialistic or Anarchistic propaganda. Neither is it a Greenback, Free Trade, nor Protection and Hard Money Society. It is simply and solely a League for state and national secularization. We do not believe in diverting it from its purpose. A man may be a member of a dozen organizations, working zealously for each one, but he need not fly off at a tangent if every organization does not adopt the isms of all the others.

It is a large undertaking to reform all the evils of the age, and it will be glory enough for the League to effect the secularization of the state. When that is done Mr. Mitchell will find no paper more earnest than THE TRUTH SEEKER in working for the amelioration of other wrong conditions of life. One thing at a time, however, is about all that most people can do and do it well.

Information for Mr. Gunnison.

It seems to us that the writer of the following letter is in the one instance blind to inevitable consequences, and in the other ignorant of the true situation:

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav seldom failed to be pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, but it seems that there are exceptions to all rules. Man is an intolerant animal, and even we Liberals are sometimes apt to forget our principles under strong excitement. I wish to criticise two of your articles that seem to me to show a little too sectarian a spirit for a Liberal.

First, I refer to your editorial against Edmunds et al. The proposed amendment seems to me to be an excellant one, just what we hav always contended for; and with only one fault—it does not go far enough. That, then, is the entire head and front of the senator's offending. Are not he and the others who voted for the amendment deserving of praise rather that blame? It was a move in the right direction, and all reforms move slowly, especially in Christian brains.

My second criticism is on the articles concerning the sale of the propaganda property in Rome by the Italian government. It seems to me that the Italian government is acting squarely against the plainest principles of civil liberty; first, by taking private property for public use without due compensation, and second, doing this to suppress freedom of speech. I think our government is in duty bound to protest, not in the name of religion, but in the name of liberty. It is no excuse that popery is the worst of superstitions, and has adopted similar tactics itself. Two wrongs do not make one right.

I would like your opinion on the above. E. S. GUNNISON.
Mt. Auburn, Iowa.

To make the matter more intelligible, we reprint the proposed amendment:

"Resolved, By the Senate and House of Representativs (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), that the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several states as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

"Article 16. No state shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, and no religious test shall be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under any state. No public property and no public revenue, nor any loan of credit by or under the authority of the United States, or any state, territory, district, or municipal corporation, shall be appropriated to or made or used for the support of any school, educational or other institution, under the control of any religious or anti-religious sect, organization, or denomination, or wherein the particular creeds or tenets shall be read or taught, in any school or institution supported in whole or in part by such revenue or loan of credit, and no such appropriation or loan of credit shall be made to any religious or anti-religious sect, organization, or denomination, or to promote its interests or tenets. This article shall not be construed to prohibit the reading of the Bible in any school or institution, and it shall not hav the effect to impair the rights of property already vested.

"SECTION 2. Congress shall hav power by appropriate legislation to provide for the prevention and punishment of violations of this article."

We find no fault with this until we come to the italicized sentence. But that one sentence not only subverts the Constitution as we hav it to-day, but would when adopted as embodied in the amendment make this a Christian nation. Its object and effect would be to legalize evangelical Christianity and place the whole authority of the United States at its service to support it.

The last clause of the first section of the amendment in effect asserts: 1. The Bible is a superior religious book, not to be classed as sectarian, and that its being read is not a sectarian practice; 2. That the Bible is the recognized religious law of the nation.

This of course would prevent its ever being expelled from the schools unless another constitutional amendment were enacted. This is as plain as a pike-staff, and unless Mr. Gunnison is anxious to see the Bible made a permanent text-book he must oppose the amendment.

The clause further enacts: 1. That no state can tax church property already existing; 2. And that it is constitutional to compel non-church-going people to support the Christian religion.

The argument would be that the Constitution recognizes the truth of the Bible—else why speak of it?—that the Bible is nothing without its deity and salvation scheme, that those therefore are a part of our Constitution. The religion of Protestants would thus become the supreme law of the land, and woe to the Freethinker who should dare deny the book sanctioned by the Constitution. Mr. Edmunds is deserving of the severest censure from all friends of secular government. The fact that the God-in-the-Constitution party publicly worked for the bill, expressing their almost complete satisfaction with it, is enough of itself to make Freethinkers examin its provisions closely, and a very slight examination shows its pernicious and dangerous character.

President Arthur's interference in the sale of the Propaganda property was a piece of political insolence without shadow of excuse. The Congregation of the Propaganda has been in existence since 1622. It is charged with the missionary enterprises of the Catholic church. In the course of over two centuries and a half it has accumulated an immense property, consisting of college buildings, lands, libraries, museums, etc., amounting to millions. This property, in common with other church property, never paid taxes, or in any way yielded revenue to support the government which protected it. To maintain itself the Italian government was compelled years ago to confiscate a large amount of church lands, buildings, and personal property. The church owned nearly everything in Italy, and paid nothing. The step was a measure of self-defense which several nations hav been compelled to take. This Propaganda property was not taken at that time, but last January the Supreme Court declared this property liable under the laws by which the rest had been confiscated.

The situation would be paralleled should the Catholic church, by centuries of exemption from taxation, systematic thieving from the government treasury, and persistent begging from and bulldozing of the people, acquire such a portion of the property of the District of Columbia that the public burden upon the rest of the inhabitants became unbearable, and our government should take forty per cent of the property for arrearages, and allow the original owners the other sixty, but the property to be controled by the government.

If under these circumstances Italy should poke her governmental nose into the affair, she would be likely to get it snubbed, and we only regret that Mr. Arthur's nasal organ was not made more retrousse by the Italian government when he yielded to the Catholic outcry. But what could be expected on the eve of a presidential election!

Funds for Politicians.

The Court of Appeals of this state has come to the help of the Lord, or of his institutions, which is all the same. That sapient tribunal has decided that it is not a violation of our state constitution to appropriate money for the support of sectarian institutions. New York city will therefore continue to be taxed a million and a half every year for the support of such delectable private and sectarian institutions as the Rev. Mr. Cowley's Shepherd's Fold, in which poor children will be trained in Christianity and the art of living on air.

According to this decision, the city is not obliged to maintain buildings in which to support its poor, but may farm them out to the lowest bidder, or to the institution which can use the most convincing argument with the committing magistrate. The poor may therefore be consigned to the care of the sect that is able to pay the highest premium for converts.

The court admits that the city is prohibited by the state constitution from giving money, or loaning its credit to private corporations—for instance, a church—but it holds that it can, under its duty to provide for the poor, compensate any institution for supporting orphans or friendless children committed to its care by local magistrates or charity commissioners. The Court of Appeals says, in effect, that if such an institution hav a special purpose beyond that of caring for the poor, it may not be deprived of public aid for that reason, as it is the fault of the city's officers if the money paid to it is more than sufficient to maintain the children committed to it, and the surplus is used for its pet religious scheme.

This decision is, in effect, a constitutional license for city officials to aid their church institutions from the public money. Any one conversant with municipal politics knows how little responsibility is felt by officials when parceling out the people's money. In New York a few thousand dollars given to a Catholic protectory or reformatory are returned with interest to the unworthy stewards in the shape of votes on election day. The decision ought to hav been handed down under the name of "A License to City Officers to use the Public Treasury as a Campaign Fund." The support of the orphans and paupers can be compensated very liberally, under this decision. There is, in fact, no limit but the sense of responsibility which the city officials feel toward the people, and this, as before stated, will not constitute a grievous burden to our municipal fathers. They feel more responsibility to the corner saloon-keepers than to public sentiment, even though the latter would bear them out in a good-sized steal if done in the name of religion.

Replacing the Old.

We giv special prominence to the proceedings of the Liberal Club on Decoration Day, for the reason that in them is illustrated an idea we are anxious to see understood and worked out. In the rapid disintegration of theology now going on, the tendency is already manifest by some liberal churches to substitute for the meaningless forms of superstition a humanitarian religion, in which God is replaced by Man. This work, it seems to us, should be led by the Liberals who hav forced the church to hitch along to this plain. Otherwise, when the new order of things is fairly inaugurated, theologians will claim the credit of the new movement, tack the name of Christianity to it, and cry that Progress is the child of the church.

Decoration Day was a most opportune time to start the new theology. The dead who die for freedom must always be honored. And it is better to make a festival of the occasion than pass it in hypocritical mourning. If Christianity be true, probably nine-tenths of the war heroes whose graves were decorated on the 30th are now in hell. Such a thought can never be the inspiration of a festival. The religion of humanity, on the other hand, has no dogmatic destiny for them who may hav died in sin, but who certainly gave their lives in support of freedom or through patriotism to their state. Humanity can forget their frailties in remembering their virtues, and honor the good without qualifying the eulogies by glimpses of hell.

The common-sense replacement of the few beneficent good points of the present religious sentiment is a work not fraught with much difficulty if Humanity be taken as the central rallying-point, and its service made glorious by recognition of its worth. The Liberal Club has set an example which may well be followed by Freethought societies all over the country.

A Step Ahead.

Although Massachusetts refused to do justice to her Agnostic citizens by repealing the oath law, she has performed one act which redounds to her credit and places her in a more creditable position among the states. The action is in relation to the Sunday laws.

Heretofore, whenever a suit for damages for personal injuries sustained on Sunday has been brought, it has been a sufficient defense to plead a violation of the Sunday law. If, for example, a person was injured while riding on a train on that day, and sued the company for damages, the company had only to answer that it was unlawful to travel on the Lord's day, and, therefore, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

The validity of this defense has been repeatedly sustained by Massachusetts courts, whose puritanical prejudices hav survived all the assaults of common sense. The most absurd results of this ruling were not sufficient to change it. In one case under this law, the Herald relates that the plaintiff had accompanied a funeral from Boston to Mount Auburn on Sunday afternoon. He was returning to Boston by way of Somerville, when he met with an accident and sustained personal injuries by reason of a defectiv highway in that town. In the suit for damages the town set up the defense that the plaintiff was traveling in violation of the Sunday law. The latter replied that attending a funeral on Sunday was lawful and proper. The Supreme Court held that the plaintiff had not violated the Sunday law in going to the cemetery, because he had taken the regular and most direct road. But his return by a circuitous route was unnecessary and for a worldly purpose. The court held this to be a sinful deviation in violation of the Sunday law, and accordingly decided that the plaintiff, being an unlawful traveler on the Lord's day, could not recover for injuries due to the negligence of the town.

By passing an act declaring that the violation of the Sunday law shall not constitute any defense in an action to recover damages for personal injuries, the legislature has relieved the state of a little of the odium left to taint the air by the witch hangers and Quaker whippers who settled within her borders and shaped her course.

"On the Rack of Persecution."

When we had finished Col. Kelso's large book, "The Bible Analyzed," he directed a copy to be sent to a Liberal friend of his living a considerable distance west of New York. The book impressed the person very favorably, and shortly after we received a letter saying as much. Before it could be put into type it was followed by another, which we print, omitting names:

"To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I sent you an article in favor of Kelso's book. Do not publish it. I am in the public school, and there is a desperate effort to put me out. Last winter I took an activ part in a Liberal meeting—furnished the music, and gave a supper for the speakers. I think it was a death-blow for me here. Or, if you do publish it, change the name and place of writing. Being obliged to work for the public has closed my mouth, and I am on the rack of persecution."

What a beautiful state of society that letter shows to exist in that town, and what a blessing Christianity is to the people of this country!

Lectures and Meetings.

J. W. Harlan, M.D., will be glad to correspond with Liberal societies concerning Materialistic lectures. "I am," he writes us, "open to engagements to lecture on Liberal topics. I hav been an elder in the Methodist church, and wish in public to expose the frauds and devilisms practiced in that church. I will answer calls to lecture in any part of the United States." Dr. Harlan's address is Michigan City, Ind.

Mr. John Storer Cobb, president of the Boston Liberal Club, intends to start about the 1st of July for a tour through the Western states. Persons and societies desirous of making lecture engagements with him, can do so by addressing him at the Investigator office. Applications should be sent as early as possible, in order that the intended route can be definitly fixed. Mr. Cobb is very well qualified to giv satisfactory lectures on all Liberal subjects, and as we know his ability we recommend him to all our western readers.—Boston Investigator

The Republican-Leader, of Arcadia, Wis., speaks very favorably of the lecture delivered by Mr. Bell in that town, as may be seen by the following: "The course of Liberal lectures delivered by Prof. W. S. Bell, and of which we gave notice last week, attracted large and appreciativ audiences, and although not all who attended were converted to the Materialistic views advocated by the professor, still it must be admitted by all that he handled his subjects with great force and ability, and a very strong sentiment seems to hav been created in favor of his views. The professor is an attractiv, pleasing, and able speaker, and although strictly advocating his views, seeks not to injure the feelings of those who disagree with him; and should he come this way again, he will undoubtedly draw even larger audiences."

Religious Exercises in the Public Schools.

The following is the full text of the decision on the question of religious exercises in the public schools rendered by the state superintendent of public instruction on May 27, 1884:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
Department of Public Instruction,
Superintendent's Office,
Albany, May 27, 1884.

In the matter of the application of the board of education of Union Free School District No. 4, of Orangetown, Rockland county.

This application represents that the above named board of education "wish to move unerringly, but firmly, in the matter of sustaining the reading of scripture and prayer as a part of the exercises in opening the daily sessions of our public school;" that the board has "not required the children of non-Protestant families to participate in repeating scripture or the Lord's prayer, but hav simply required them to behave with decorum;" that a number of Catholic families "ask that their children be allowed to remain outside until the devotional exercises are concluded," and that "this interference causes much disorder outside of the room, and the subsequent entrance of these pupils causes a loss of time and disturbance to class work."

I hav carefully examined the special act under which this school was organized to see if there was any provision therein which might be held to authorize any other or different rule for the government of this particular school, in the respect in question, than that which applies to the public schools organized under the general law. I do not find any such exceptional provision.

By the constitution of this state all people, in respect to the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, stand upon a footing of absolute equality. Interference therewith, in the way of discrimination or preference, even by legislativ enactment, is, by the express words of that instrument, prohibited.

Under our public school system, within the legal limitations of age and residence, instruction is free. The material resources necessary for the maintenance of this immense and complicated system are drawn at large from a population characterized by dissimilar religious beliefs, observances, modes of worship, and preferences. With such a public furnishing the money to support the schools, supplying them with the children in attendance, and having equal rights to the full and equal enjoyment of all the benefits of the schools, if it were possible to devise some limited measure of religious instruction for adoption in the schools, upon which all these diverse classes and sects could harmonize, it would be a gratifying result.

But this is manifestly impracticable and impossible. The only alternativ, therefore, to preserve the benefits of the constitutional guarantees, in letter and spirit, and to secure to all absolute equality of right in matter of religious predilection, must be, however reluctantly the conclusion is arrived at, to exclude religious instruction and exercises from the public schools during school hours.

This conclusion involves the enunciation of no new principle.

An examination of the records in this department shows a uniform series of decisions by my predecessors, extending over a period of more than forty years, in substantial conformity with the views above expressed.

In 1838, Hon. John A. Dix, then superintendent of common schools, referring to a former decision in 1837, says (Orders and Decisions, vol. vi, p. 391), "I hav heretofore decided that a teacher might open his school with prayer, provided he did not encroach upon the hours allotted to instruction; and provided that the attendance of the scholars was not exacted as a matter of school disciplin." This was a case in which the teacher was in the habit of attending in the schoolhouse at fifteen minutes before nine in the morning (nine o'clock being the hour for opening the school), and devoting the intermediate time to religious exercises.

In 1839, Superintendent John C. Spencer, having occasion to examin and pass upon the question (Orders and Decisions, vol. viii, p. 101), says: "Prayers cannot form any part of the school exercises, or be regulated by the school disciplin. If had at all, they should be had before the hour of nine o'clock, the usual hour of commencing school in the morning, and after five in the afternoon. . . . Both parties hav rights, and it is only by mutual and reciprocal regard by each to the rights of the other, that peace can be maintained or a school can flourish. The teacher may assemble in his schoolroom before nine o'clock, the children of those parents who desire him to conduct religious exercises for them, and the children of those who object to the practice will be allowed to retire or absent themselvs from the room. If they persist in remaining they must conduct themselvs with decorum and propriety becoming the occasion. If they do not so conduct, they may be dealt with as intruders."

On another occasion during the same year (Orders and Decisions, vol. viii, p. 87), he says: "Neither the common school system nor any other social system can be maintained unless the conscientious views of all are respected. The simple rule, so to exercise your own rights as not to infringe on those of others, will preserve equal justice among all, promote harmony, and insure success to our schools."

The principles laid down in these early decisions hav been followed by every one of my predecessors in office, no distinction having been made between scripture reading and prayers, but each having been held, in separate and distinct appeals, to constitute no legitimate part of the business of the public schools. They will be my guide and govern my action in all cases of like nature which may come officially before me.

In the particular case now under consideration, with these principles in view, and a disposition to carry them out fairly and to respect the rights and conscientious opinions of all, the board of education will, I think, hav no difficulty in avoiding further contention and securing harmony in the school.

W. B. Ruggles,
State Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Letters from Friends.

EAST PORTLAND, OREGON, May 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find 25 cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ALMANAC for 1884. We are receiving your paper regularly, and we would miss it very much if it should not come. I hav read with great pleasure Mr. Remsburg's answer to J. S. Maiben. As I am a nativ of Poland, and know all the suffering and privations, it did me good to see that we hav a friend in truth. I remain yours, C. L. SILVERMAN.

LORAINE, ILL., June 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Three cheers for John Peck and THE TRUTH SEEKER! I think Mr. Peck will find a rich subsistence if his stomach holds out with his grip on Mr. Talmage, and we all will hav a share in Peck. I hope my share will be a bushel, as it is more than a peck now.

Yours for a truthful picture, even of golden gods and holy pokers, R. H. WILTS.

POWDER RIVER, WYO., May 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3, for which please send me your valuable paper for one year. I hav just read Ingersoll's last lecture in your paper, and it strikes me as being more to the point than anything I hav ever read. He surely givs them plain talk, and as Sullivan does it—straight from the shoulder. I for one wish we had more reformers like Colonel Ingersoll. I am what is called a cowboy, and I belong to a class that are held in holy horror by your average orthodox Christians. But I would hate to exchange morals with the average orthodox Christian, for certainly the more I see of these would-be holy people the less use I hav for them.

Wishing you success in your great and glorious work of liberating mankind, I remain, Yours truly,

C. W. MOSGAREIDGE.

HARTFORD, ONT., May 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I am mad. My postmaster, a hard-shell Baptist, opens my paper, and has told the elder of the church that I am an Infidel. I shall not deny it. He thinks he is going to injure my business. I am a poor shoemaker, like the late D. M. Bennett, who will be spoken well of when my postmaster is forgotten. I gave the elder the two lectures printed in your noble paper. He found no fault with them. I take four papers, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is grabbed quicker than any of them when they come. Will send you some more subscriptions after a while, and I want some more of your books. Please inform me what books I want to confute this damnable priestcraft doctrin. I am going to spend all my loose money for the spread of a good sound doctrin.

PHILIP SLAGHT.

CINCINNATI, O., June 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: You hav not received a line from me for a long time, not because I am in any sense unfriendly to THE TRUTH SEEKER, or because I hav been converted to some kind of religious hobby. No; that would be a thing impossible; a backbone Materialist never swerves to right or left, but squarely and firmly stands on the platform of honest truth, as found in nature, and there only. Some of your very quizzical correspondents seem to think that T. Winter's Materialism is a little mite too solid for their stomachs; they seem to relish a kind of wishy-washy article, neither fish or flesh. But all such must look elsewhere for a dirt of that grade. I deal in no mixtures of second-hand principles, but pure, unvarnished realities; and, as I liv, I will never step down from the pedestal of truth Materialistic, for that, in lapse of time, must triumph over every phase of superstition.

Yours fraternally, T. WINTER.

ORION, MICH., May 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 for the Monument Fund. I am rather late, but it will count, even if it is the last. I hav been working here for the last ten years to encourage Freethought principles, and for the past three years those principles hav been undermining the strict church teachings. The churches are lamenting the coldness of the members, with no additions. We need organization, but there is not enough Liberal influence here at present to set things going. There may be a better day coming. I hav been distributing Liberal papers here until the church people think I am going crazy. After being a consistent church-member for fifty-three years, at the age of seventy-two to make a resolve to be honest is, they think, something strange—too much for them to believe. But I am only giving free expression to my honest belief in ignoring an individual supreme being who rules and governs all actions and movements in the universe of worlds.

L. PREDMORE.

MAITLAND, MO., May 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which please continue my subscription for such time as it will pay for. I am sorry I cannot send more, but will probably be able to scratch up another dollar by the time this runs out; and, perhaps, it will come as handy to you then as now. I am proud to know that there is such a paper in existence; and the only regret I hav about it is that its merits and value are not more generally known and appreciated. I am, also, very proud indeed to note how rapidly Freethought is gaining ground. Though I am comparativly a young man, I well remember when a man with Liberal ideas found it prudent to be careful of how and to whom he talked. But the tables are turning and the "servants of God" are very cautious when in company with known Infidels.

We hav a nice young town of seven or eight hundred inhabitants; two capacious churches; one M. E., the other Christian; the M. E's., hav service once a month, the other has a pastor at all at present. We hav neither a resident preacher nor a dance-house, but a happy, prosperous, intelligent community, with many Liberals interspersed.

Yours, D. MAXWELL.

CHESTER, PA.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of May 31st, Mr. John Peck very ably reviews Mr. Talmage's sermon. It is such mystified sermons that keep the people in darkness and bondage to the priesthood.

If people were taught their duty in a plain and brief manner, so they could fully comprehend it, they would become more self-reliant instead of priest-reliant. Religion is looked upon by many as something very mysterious. There is no duty, in my opinion, more simple and plain. "The wayfaring man, though a fool, cannot err." I think the whole requirement is embraced in eight words, Liv up to your highest idea of right. This is a duty that would vary according to the idea of the individual, but nevertheless it is all and the very best we can do in church or out of church.

Very truly yours, R. I. LAMBORN.

WHAT CHEER, IOWA, May 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3.25—$3 for one year's payment for THE TRUTH SEEKER and 25 cents for THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. After having had a trial of your paper I find I shall want it as long as I can find money to pay for it. I hav read many Freethought papers, but I think yours ahead of the best of them.

I used to think myself a follower of the Lamb, but I found out when I left bonnie Scotland and came to this country I had been following a wild-goose chase. When leaving Scotland my kind, beloved pastor told me if I went to America and did not take my wife and family along with me God would not answer my prayers for their protection. I thought if that was true that was not the kind of God I wanted, so I set to work to find a better one. And I am happy to say I hav found one in place of the old humbug. It was six months before I was able to get my family out to this country, and my wife told me the pastor asked her once how I was getting along. She told him that I was doing well and that she was going out to me. He said, "Well, I was rather hard on him, but it was all for his good." Well, yes, it was; it opened my eyes. ALEX. CLARK.

ARROWSMITH, ILL., May 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I seldom consume any of your space, but I should like to ask our Liberal brethren what they think of the idea of collecting all the "Letters from Friends" that hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and binding them in book form. They would make several volumes of practical Liberalism, giving the true history of the struggle of honest men all over the country while fighting for the principles of justice and right. Of course we could not expect to giv any room to the common enemy by printing any of their letters. We hav thousands of our friends who would gladly elbow each other in one grand army of readers during the long Sundays, while our superstitious enemies were working themselvs up to a fever heat saying bad things about us. If our good old wheel horse or pioneer, Mr. Bennett, was yet living, the chances would be that he would collect the letters, for he was never known to leave anything undone that had a tendency to help the cause of right. The letters would be a tribute to the memory of Mr. Bennett, and a treasure to his wife. A correct sum of Liberal ideas, and a bible to the sincere at heart, it would be a perfect mirror into which the clergy could look and see themselvs as others see them. Let us hav them, and inscribe them, "Letters from Mr. Bennett's Friends." Will some one second my motion? I wish the letters were more generally read. THE TRUTH SEEKER is too large to allow us time to read it all and reflect upon it well, and read our common dailies too. So if we had some way to preserve them in the order of their dates, we could re-read them at a more convenient season.

Ever a truth seeker and a truth preserver, PENN KIRK.

WAUSHIP, UTAH, May 21, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I mail you to-day's Salt Lake Tribune, containing an account of Jo Cook's lecture in that city last Sunday. His first sentence was, "Do you know of an Infidel book that you'd be willing to put under your head for a lying pillow?" The reporter thinks Mr. Cook pointed out the failure of the unbelievers to provide suitable books for pillows; but the reverse is true, for Infidel books do abolish the idea of a God ready to damn us for unbelief, even though belief is impossible. They also abolish all superstition, hence such pillows must be conduciv to peaceful and happy slumber.

I am glad to see in the same paper a notice that some prominent Liberals will reply to Mr. Cook, and I feel sure the reply will not make him a very comfortable pillow.

There has been a post-office established in this territory lately named "Ingersoll," I presume in honor of the immortal Robert G. I say immortal, because I believe he will be as immortal as man can be. I think his fame as a great and good teacher will increase as ages roll by, and his sayings be texts for future sermons, and countless thousands be named in his honor. Which reminds me of a thirty-miles distant neighbor who has named his son, a bright baby twenty months old, D. M. Bennett, in honor of that late champion of liberty, the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I think our territory is advancing very rapidly in Liberal ideas. The Utah commissioners in a late report said: "Utah is so changed from Utah of ten years ago that could the old style of affairs be restored for a week, the old slavery, the old restrictions, the Mormon people themselvs would rise up in rebellion. There are forces at work which are all-powerful, and which no restriction, no falsehood, and no superstition can resist." Which I think is a correct statement, and the forces spoken of are what the Rev. Jo would consider material for uncomfortable pillows.

That such pillows may become universal is the wish of

Yours truly, WM. REYNOLDS.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., June 2, E.M. 284.

MR. EDITOR: Agreeable to your request, I inclose petition signed by myself and others. I was in hopes to get a long list of names, but the Liberal element in this place are rather "weak-kneed" when it comes to action. There is a sufficient number to hav a good League in this city, but the excuses some giv for not signing the petition also express their sentiments in regard to forming a League. One says: "I don't wish to mix up with religion in any way;" and, "Well, I hav just commenced business here and I don't wish to offend my patrons; but then, them are my sentiments."

One thing I do find: those that are constant readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER never refuse to sign such a petition, and on the whole are more aggressiv and non-compromising with the hydra-headed monsters, superstition and bigotry, than any other class, due mainly to the grand enlightening and uplifting forces that are paramount in its columns—"long may it wave!" Although I cannot be a subscriber on account of my finances being at so low an ebb, yet, through the kindness of one of your readers, I am permitted to hav it to read every week. One word in regard to the League; there is some talk of reorganizing the League, and, with all due respect to Man and its able editors, I would like to see THE TRUTH SEEKER made the organ of the reorganization. There is no paper in the land that would be so effectiv in perpetuating and building up the National League as THE TRUTH SEEKER. More solid, genuin information and death-dealing arguments to superstition in its varied forms cannot be found in any Liberal paper in the United States. Others may honestly differ with me, but I would like to see as a part of the head of THE TRUTH SEEKER, "The official Organ of the National Liberal League."

Yours in annihilating myths, ARTHUR C. EVERETT.

AYER, MASS., May 26, 284.

MR. EDITOR: My only apology for neglect to renew my subscription when due is that, in my eagerness to peruse and enjoy the benefits of the healthy sentiments it contains, I tear off and throw away the wrapper without looking at the tab.

The contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER are the "lights of the world." Skeptics and Infidels (to churchal creeds and dogmas) hav carried the torch that lighted the world through the dark, cruel, bloody reign of the Christian church, backed by the strong arm of the state, both innocent of promoting human love, happiness, or advancement; deserving the appellation they gave to others—infidel. To infidelity to church authority, and fidelity to human rights, is due all the progress of the world. Jesus, the great Infidel of his time, broke through the brazen firmament of religious despotism, and let a ray of light and hope down upon earth; and the clergy hav been industrious in trying to stuff his dead body into that aperture. They preferred darkness to light; a dead, crucified savior to a living savior; to living, loving, men and women, who dared say with their exemplar, "I am the light of the world."

If the priesthood had used their efforts to make this world a place of pleasure and enjoyment, taught how to be healthy and happy, a primary heaven instead of a primary hell, what a splendid achievement would hav been theirs; what a happy world would now be ours! Religion would walk with science among natural and solid facts; and science would reverently bow to righteous and peaceful religion, fraternal and natural allies.

Would it not be well to substitute humanity for Christianity, since the latter's history is written in blood? The former demands no human sacrifices, and has no morbid relish for burnt corpses of animals; no admiration for cringing, teasing mendicants, and requres neither prayer nor worship to keep him good natured; whose devotees say "Go into the world and preach the gospel (of peace on earth and good will unto man) unto every creature." Later on, another says, "The world is my country, to do good my religion." Transpose these beautiful sentiments as to authorship, would it lessen their beauty—be any less divine—less binding in their influence on human obligations?

We may extract some comfort, some courage, from the record of the last twenty-five years. Infidels hav proved their fidelity to the cardinal principles of human happiness "here and now," despite the hilt of that old flaming sword (whose blade has been converted into something mightier) which is still wielded by some to circumvent the spirit of progress. "Let us hav peace." ELIJAH MYRICK.

IN CAMP, LAKE CO., OR., May 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me, through your columns, to say a few words for one of our Pacific coast Liberals, Prof. W. J. Dean. About a year ago I listened to a course of experimental lectures on electricity given by him before the University of Seattle in Washington Territory.

I did not know that he was a Liberal, yet I wondered how a scientist of his ability could believe in spooks and spirits.

I heard nothing more of him until a few days ago, when, on passing through a small town in Jackson county, in this state. I saw a few hand-bills for a Liberal lecture by W. J. Dean. I quickly decided to stop over and hear it, and was well paid for so doing.

His subject was "Freethought and Freethinkers," which he handled in a masterly manner, throwing out many a nut that his orthodox opponents could not easily crack if they should try ever so hard.

He courteously invited the clergy to public discussion and offered to reply to any question that might be asked. At this an old gentleman, evidently not having the iconoclastic views of the speaker, asked what he had to offer in place of the religions that he would destroy. The answer was a settler; I wish I could giv it entire. That wound up the questioning.

Prof. Dean's style is clear, logical, scholarly, and very courteous. In his pleasing and gentlemanly manner on the stage he reminds me of B. F. Underwood. Like the latter, he makes no attempt at oratorical flourish. He informed me, in conversation the next day, that he depended more on the "force of facts than on oratorical display"—that if you convince a man by oratory he may not "stay convinced." He "would prefer to fully convince one reasoning man to making a temporary impression upon a hundred." And, indeed, his style is convincing. He leaves an opponent nothing to hang to—hardly a show for a quibble. An opponent cannot go away angry and defiant, but to meditate and think. At least this was the effect upon me, for I did not fully class myself with the Liberals. There were some points that wanted clearing up. Mr. Dean's lecture and the subsequent conversation with him, together with the reading of two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER that he gave me, hav settled my faith. Yes, friend Liberals, I hav come to stay. And I deem it giving credit where credit is due to thus speak a word for so earnest and talented a worker as Prof. Dean.

I am sorry to say that he is going to stop lecturing—that "it does not pay," etc. Really this should not be. Such ability should not be allowed to rust. The Liberals of Oregon and California should keep him at work.

Yours to "stay," LOUIS STANLEY.

MILWAUKEE, OR., May 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I was listening the other Sabbath in church to a little girl, she being heard in her catechism, and being the only one in her class. I will giv it below. I quote from memory.

INSTRUCTOR. Who made the world? PUPIL. Dod.

I. Who made Adam? P. Dod.

I. What did God make Adam out of? P. Dust of the earf.

The instructor was heard to giv a grunt and say that it could not be expected of a child so young to answer with the same understanding that those of riper years would.

Shame them out of it, talk them out of it, lick them out of it, or any way to get them out. E. W. CRESSY.

CLEVELAND, O., May 25, 284.

MR. EDITOR: With your kind permission, I would like to say a few words in reply to the article entitled, "A Query," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 3d. I am surprised to learn that Miss Colman is an advocate of vivisection, for I hav always given the women credit for possessing the most tender sympathies in regard to inflicting pain in the interest of any cause whatever, and I never dreamed she would lend her aid to the cause of vivisection. The idea of experimenting on an animal to find what is good for man surprises me indeed. What, is there no difference between the anatomy of the animal and the anatomy of man? I think there is a big difference, but in order that vivisection of living animals will be of any value to the human race the system of the two must be alike, or else the knowledge of the one will be of no benefit to the other. How are we, by studying the diseases of the animal, to learn anything of any benefit to the diseases of man? I hav made it a practice for years to watch the phenomena of disease in both man and beast, and hav always found a wide difference between them, and I know positivly that in a great many cases it requires an entirely different treatment in different persons for the same disease, while the animals themselvs differ materially from one another. It is quite impossible to obtain always the same conditions of the nervous system of the animal upon which you intend to operate. This being the case, how then do you expect to obtain any but conflicting results? And if the evidence does not agree that is obtained from vivisection, how then are you going to turn it to the advantage of the human race? Dr. Foote says in his article of March 22d that men hav made experiments on themselvs. If a man wishes to endanger his own life for the sake of knowledge, why, he has a perfect right to do so. Indeed, I am not so bigoted as to say he shouldn't do so, but if he should experiment on another's person against that person's will, then I should say, "Stop!" And if he did not stop, then I would say the law should make him stop. To admit the utility of vivisection to animals would be to admit more than most vivisectors, I am afraid, would be willing to admit, and that is the evolution of man from beast, or at least to hav emanated from the same source, which it did. Then the animal is entitled to the same rights as ourselvs, and should not be put to the torture by force any more than man, and I would say to Mr. Eoote that if he cannot produce a better argument in favor of vivisection, he had better yield the fort to his far more worthy opponent, Elliott Preston. It is needless to say that in one instance, on which he lays considerable stress, the facts of which I am well acquainted with, having gained the knowledge without the aid of vivisection, or from studying the works of vivisectors, having found one instance where vivisection was useless or needless, I was led to look for more, and sure enough I hav found them, and I hav little doubt but I will, upon investigation, find that we can dispense with that most cruel of all cruelties, the torture of living animals, and labor to better the cause of humanity in a nobler and a better way. DENNIS A. LOSSING.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., June 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I had supposed that one could entertain an opinion and giv expression to such if the language used was proper and courteous, free from personalities, etc., in regard to creeds, sects, parties, and policies, and not subject oneself to the opprobrium of being called a blasphemer, slanderer, and the like, if silent on the creed and acts of our good, pious, orthodox friends and neighbors. Not so, however. Some who call themselvs Freethinkers handle and appear to relish the use of those terms as a child does sugar-plums.

"Well, every dog must hav his way,
Hav his little bark and little say."

When the favorit theory of a man weakens under the presentation of logical truths, and his best argument is the equivalent of "You lie, sir," he will be apt to make the world think his cause is lost. So here comes a volunteer recruit with an honored and distinguished name on the left, and an M.D. on the right, that is supposed to stand for doctor of medicin. See THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 17th, page 314, where I find Dr. Chapman saying that I hav been slandering the Oneida Community. And again he says: "Either monogomy or polygamy is natural. For this argument I shall call the Community polygamous, as it is simply promiscuous intercourse, and I hav been waiting long for some one to support their charges on scientific grounds." If science can solve such questions as polygamy and scientific intercourse, you are the man, doctor, to grapple with them. That is a new idea. It must be an original one, and it may be a great one. Step firmly to the front, doctor. Don't be timid. The science of "promiscuous intercourse!" Agassez or Humboldt never dreamed of that. And please tell us what is natural, doctor, if neither monogamy nor polygamy is, and if promiscuous intercourse—the kind that you call that which is in vogue at the Community—is another kind, refined and superior to that practiced in ordinary brothels. Make the distinction careful, doctor, for the sake of truth. Don't slander the pious Community. And again I ask how many engaged in practicing promiscuous intercourse of the refined or common order it takes to make a brothel. How many to make a gigantic one—three hundred, more or less?

I hav never discussed the Mormon question, but it is kindred to this, and as you hav introduced it, I will only say I consider the Community woman privileged beyond that of the Mormon. She can only be one of the wives or slaves of the man who owns her. No aspirations, and told that only through that portal will the gates of heaven open to her! While if the Community woman is ambitious, she can proudly say, "See how many husbands I own. He is my slave, if I am his;" and she is also made to think that theirs is a God-ordained institution.

J. VAN DENBURGH.

SIMCOE, ONT., May 24, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just been reading your "Gems of Thought" column, and the second reads, "Yet we must confess that there is evil in human nature. We know that a certain thing is right, and yet there is the colossal selfishness of our nature which stands up in arms against us, and seeks to corrupt our reason." Now, on my part, I most distinctly object to such reading in the Gem column of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is untruthful, and disrespectful to nature and the column. There is no evil in nature except what man himself has put there, which was one of the couldn't-be-helpeds in connection with his growth. It is the work of the gods that he has made out of the stock of nothing. Andthis brings me to the idea that some things can be made out of nothing, for all the gods were made out of it, especially the Christian God, and made by this wonderful animal, man. Wrong education made the gods, and of course the gods couldn't make anything but wrong education, which produces what we call evil. And I can easily understand why it should get incorporated into our natures, and thus become a mighty devil; but I could not understand how man, wonderful and all as he is, could make a god that made everything out of nothing, and become the slave of the god that he made out of nothing, without becoming a partner with the nothing agent, evil; but he has something to work with now, and I know he can make the slave into nothing again; but he can't do it with nothing, and he don't hav to.

And now respecting that much-abused word, selfishness, which is used to represent life, which is in itself good, and in which there can be no evil. With it man livs, and without it man is not. And it is not even related to nothing, out of which evil is produced. The more life a man has, or selfishness, as Felix Adler calls it, the better should be that man, if he has the necessary knowledge to direct with. And that can be bought from the Truth Seeker Company and S. R. Wells & Co., of New York. I owe my present existence to the latter firm I am sure, by stepping into their office twenty years ago last January, with my blue clothes on. The science of phrenology helps the growth of the mind, the man, and helps to direct him and the science of health. To life, economy shows the way.

I hav just been reading Elliott Preston's arguments about free rum and free crime, and I find no evil in his selfishness or life, but I find his necessity to apply to S. R. Wells & Co. for the volumes of the "Science of Health" published about eleven years ago. He does not yet know that it was the god that man has made out of nothing, properly called lies, who is responsible for all the present human misery, and chat prohibition simply means to try to cure one lie with another lie. And they still hav possession of Elliott Preston to a certain extent, for he believes in unnatural stimulants, and of course believes in an unnatural means as a cure to a certain extent only. He is not able to see that education can remove all the intemperance complained of, and that prohibition is intemperance of a different kind. I believe this knowledge has been stored in New York, I will say, thirty years, and yet most people know nothing about it, and the states hav just commenced to put it in the schools; but they will hav to put the Bible and Testament out before it can hav a fair show, because a Bible believer can't become very sound on the temperance question. The parent of all intemperance is lies, and the victims are slaves. He is the freeman whom the truth makes free, and all are slaves besides. Please don't ask me to prove my assertions, even to Liberals, for that requires the ability to remove lies—which all Liberals must know is very hard work—before the truth can be properly placed. Besides, the work is already well done and for sale.

I know there is a great number of Liberals who understand this question as well as I do, and better, and I know that there is a greater number who don't. and I suggest that Liberals become acquainted with the health laws as soon as possible, and help to kill the gods that hav incorporated themselvs in the medical schools, and are the sustainers of the present intemperance so much complained of, which is removable with liberty and right education only. Let us include the science of health first, with all the other sciences, and unite as one individual. We represent the best of the human race, and we should aim to prove it as soon as possible in every sense of the word. Never mind the cowards; they will come fast enough.

JAMES WILLIAMSON.

MOUND CREEK, KAN., May 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Your old friend and long-time subscriber, Major Schofield, and myself think THE TRUTH SEEKER cannot afford to let the tremendous tangle on finance contained in Isaac Cohen's communication of March 29th remain unchallenged.

But for the misuse of the term "value," the first column is sound, clear, and distinct. "Value" is a very handy word, but when used in the place of "price," or "cost," somersets the thing wonderfully. The value of money is not the cost of it, since cost is sacrifice, the death of labor. Its value is the usufruct in use. No price can be fixed on its value, more than on air, or the circulation of our blood. Lord Rascom, Italian delegate to the Paris conference, puts the basic principles of money pat on bed rock. "Metal is one thing, money is another; nature makes metals, law makes money." Nature creates matter, law creates abstract facts. Hence law and money can neither be seen, felt, weighed, nor measured. Nor can Congress regulate the weight or fineness of money, for it has neither. Neither gravitation nor quality inheres in it. Both are ex cathedra to it. Congress can regulate the number of cents in a dollar, and that it shall be a legal tender; it is then a perfect law-created fact, a fact to liv in use forever; while the fact remains a fact that it was created and issued on cost from some individual or company, which cost the money canceled by its first step into circulation. And, also, it paid the nation's indebtedness to the unit or company, for the cost of labor or anything else the nation received for its use. Of this cost of labor, etc., the nation has the use and benefit forever. Moreover, individual's credit and government's debt created the necessity for law to create money to cancel both individual credit and national debt. It cannot be done in any other way but by taxes. Indeed, a government worthy the name is in duty bound to pay its indebtedness to itself by law. No government should giv a bond or pay interest under any circumstances. And mark it, on this particular cost that each dollar represents, and nothing else, with law, it is that money is based.

Did anybody ever hear the word "redeemed" applied to gold money, so called? Still able writers seem determined to saddle it on paper money, so called? Now I dogmatically assert the man does not, never did, or ever will liv who can show or point out a scintillation of difference in money. It is always a law-created fact. The concrete material that conveys this fact from hand to hand points out that thing which it—money—represents; which thing the government that issued the money—legal tender—received before it issued it; and the nomen tells definitly in dollars what it cost him who credited the nation. But choosing a costly, limited material to stamp money on traverses in many woeful ways its beneficence. Still the fact, like every fact, as truth, is ever the same in essence. The word "redemption," applied to money, is a misnomer, a contradiction. Can justice, honesty, fact, be redeemed? To pay debts with money, or part with it in exchanges, is no redemption in any fair, legitimate meaning of that term. It "must be redeemed" implies some disability. There is no sin or defect in money. It is the summum bonum benefaction of law; to kill debt and credit at every step while the power that made it livs. But my friend Mr. Cohen says: "That portion which goes back to the support of the government is 'redeemed' by its taxing power." The government's taxing power puts individuals under the burden of a tax debt. The money, when paid in, "redeemed" the man, by paying his, and not the money's debt—if there was any redemption at all—just as the greenback redeemed—saved—the nation by use. When a government receives money to pay taxes, it must reissue as at first, to cancel cost of labor done; it now represents that cost, until it is again received, and reissued on new cost to whoever receives it. To receive and not reissue counts nothing. And if redeemed, as per the true meaning—that is, burnt, and a bond or gold given in its stead, it is robbery and murder. It is like burning your house, then giv a bond equal to its worth, then liv out of doors or be at the cost of a new one.

Therefore, emphatically, money cannot be redeemed, but it may be smothered and rendered a curse by misuse. It needs no "security," since it is based within itself; but it does need protection from nation-wreckers and pauper-makers. From constitutional "coin basis" money sings: Brothers, truth seekers, relief workers! Land free for a free people! National money stamped on the cheapest, durable, and convenient material, in quantity to zero per cent interest, may save the nation from impending ruin. The monopoly of land or money continued, there is no ground for hope. Men, yea, women of America! the "stream runs hard;" row for life, row! Yea, save the reckless wreckers from themselvs! The Lesson of the Flowers.

A DIALOG.

First Voice.

O royal gift of lovely flowers
That gilds with brightness life's dark hours,
That softly soothes the heart's dull pain,
And wakens it to joy again!
That speaks response to happy thought,
And brighter makes the gayest lot;
To beauty givs a double share,
And smooths the troubled brow of care.
From valley, plain, and mountain hight,
Sweet blossoms rise like gems of light;
And all the land, from shore to shore,
Thus with flowers is jeweled o'er.
From garden, woodland, dell, and grove,
Their messages come fraught with love,
And laden deep with tenderness,
To comfort, cheer, and sweetly bless.

Second Voice. (With wreaths of flowers.)

No preacher e'er had power to teach
Such sermons as the flowers preach!
Their voiceless lessons plain are heard
By ears attuned to catch their word.
Their perfume spreads in lavish love,
Like incense from some world above;
And garlands, that we twining wreathe,
Make fragrant all the air we breathe.
Petted child and soul forsaken,
Alike by each the gift is taken;
The prince and peasant, each receives
Alike the fragrance of the leaves.
And thus, true love the flowers paint,
The same to sinner and to saint.
No titled name their odors know,
But to all hearts their blessings flow.

Third Voice. (With Morning Glories.)

What poet, though with golden lyre,
And heart, o'er filled with heavenly fire,
E'er has told so sweet a story
As sings the purple Morning Glory?

Fourth Voice. (With bouquet of Forget-Me-Nots.)

What touches tenderly our thought,
Like blue-eyed, sweet Forget-me-not?
O memories pure of precious friend,
This lovely, modest flower doth send,
And through its mirror, bright and free,
Faces of dear ones we may see.

Fifth Voice. (With Mignonette.)

And where its seal hath meekness set
As on the scented Mignonette?
May such sweetness fold and hover
O'er all hurts that we discover.

Sixth Voice. (With Lilies.)

What eloquence the Lilies wake.
Born on the bosom of the lake!
But queenly crown they ever yield
Unto the Lilies of the field.
For kings in cloth of Tyrian shade,
Hav never been like these arrayed.
These flowers won a deathless name,
And diadems of lasting fame,
When Mary's son, strong, brave, and free,
Walked through the fields of Galilee,
And blessing breathed of love and power,
Upon the simple, blooming flower.

Seventh Voice. (With garland of Roses.)

Soft on the Rose doth beauty rest.
Acknowledged her most gracious guest.
So fair and queenly, who can guess
The secret of her royal dress?
Or by what art the color glows
Within the bosom of the Rose?

Eight Voice. (With English Ivy.)

And Ivy leaves all lustrous shine,
Since friendship's name they close entwine.
Without the hand of friend to clasp,
How slight on life would be our grasp!
And earth would be a lonely place
Without one dear familiar face.

Ninth Voice. (With Pansies.)

In Pansy leaves sweet thoughts we see,
Whisp'ring ever—think of me!

Tenth Voice. (With Myrtle.)

But Myrtle givs the chiefest grace,
For love hath made its name and place;
And where love's streams unruffled flow,
That place is made a heaven below,
From sea to sea, from shore to shore,
A sacred spot forevermore.

Eleventh Voice. (With bunch of Cypress.)

Of mourning souls dark Cypress tells,
Of bleeding hearts, and tolling bells;
Of loved ones parted many a year,
By low green grave and funeral bier.

Twelfth Voice. (With Snowdrops and Amaranths.)

But then, through bitter, blinding tears,
The Snowdrop consolation bears,
And tells of land of purest joy,
Where happiness knows not alloy;
Where no corrupting moth or rust,
Can change our treasures into dust.
And amaranthine buds unfold,
That we, in them, may thus behold,
Calm and serene, above all strife,
An emblem of eternal life,
That, by and by, the mystery plain.
Our loved ones we may see again,

Thirteenth Voice. (With tuft of Grass.)

And now, I trust that ere we pass,
We'll recollect the soft green grass,
That a carpet ev'ry springtime weaves,
To cover last year's blighted leaves;
Its use and beauty both combine
To make the wealth of summertime.

Third Voice.

Thus we may from the flowers learn,
Where'er on earth our feet may turn!
Of wisdom, justice, love, and truth,
And ways to find perpetual youth;
For earth a very Eden is,
And full of sweetest, purest bliss.
Perfected law doth surely show;
And we hav but to ope our eyes
To find ourselvs in paradise.

Fifth Voice.

O sweetest month of queenly June!
Thy flowers keep our hearts in tune,
With Nature's heart so grand in tone,
To beat responsiv to her own.
We may not solve her problems all,
Nor know her ways or heed her call;
Or know if life is just as bright
Beyond the pale of death's dark night.
But whether activ life is ours,
When we shall drop beneath the flowers,
Or sleep shall press our eyelids down
Beneath an everlasting crown,
We know that here our happiness
Will grow as we shall others bless,
That life, unknown or understood,
Its essence is in doing good.

A Cat Story.

I once lived in the town of Brunswick, in the county of Rensselaer, New York, and owned a farm there. Of course I had all the domestic animals that were necessary, among them cats; and as they became too numerous, we sometimes contrived to get rid of them when the old cat was not around to know what became of her babes; so, one morning, in the absence of the cat, the kittens mysteriously (to the old cat) disappeared. The same day myself and my men were in the woods preparing our next year's firewood, and in doing so, I always selected dead or decaying timber; and in looking around, I found a large black oak tree with a dead top, and on that account we cut it down. As it fell, the dead top and branches broke all to pieces, and out of it ran an old squirrel. On going up to where the tree was badly broken, I found a squirrel's nest with five very small squirrels in it—so small that they could not crawl away, neither could they see, for their eyes were yet closed. I first thought that I would leave them there for their mother to find and nurse, but, on second thought, I knew that we should work around there for a long time, and until we left, the old one would not come back, and the little ones would surely die where they were; so I thought I would take them to the house, and feed them to my cat. I accordingly put them in my hat, and when I went to the house I called my cat and gave her one to eat, but instead of eating it, as I expected she would, she began mewing and purring, and licked it all over, all the time talking to it very lovingly. I sat down to my dinner, and when I had finished I offered the cat the other four squirrels, expecting she would eat some of the rest, even if she would not eat the first one, but she licked them, and talked to them as only a cat can talk, but would not not eat any. I felt afraid that after all they would perish. So I caught the cat, and opened the mouth of one of the little squirrels, and held it to where there was plenty of milk. In less than two minutes it was as full as it could hold. I then served the other four in the same way until they were likewise fed, and still the cat would not eat one. Putting them all in the basket where the kittens had been, I went away to my work. When I returned at night I found them full and comfortable, and then I concluded to leave them to the care of the cat. In a few days their eyes opened, and they became very lively and sociable. As they grew up they would come to us, on our laps and shoulders, to receive a nut or some good thing, and finally, we taught them to search our pockets for nuts, and never allowed them to search in vain; with them it was simply to "ask and receive," but, as they grew older, they learned to distinguish between our folks and strangers. As soon as a stranger came to the house, the squirrels would start and run for an old-fashioned tall clock in the corner, and climbing to the top would there hide away all but their heads, and remain there until the stranger departed, when they would come down and make themselvs at home. It was amusing to see the old cat go to the foot of the clock and call to them to come down (as I suppose), but it was of no use, as long as a stranger was in the house. They all grew up to be large, fat, handsome squirrels, and then we were about as badly off as when we had too many kittens; so I gave them away one at a time to my friends, but kept one for myself and the old cat, but that one, finally, was accidentally killed, and I felt the loss more than if I had lost a cow. Our Puzzle Box.

HIDDEN ENIGMA.

In the "Radical Pulpit"
The first is ever found:
"The Darwins" all hav it,
Where'er they abound.
Of the "Clergyman's Victims"
It always is one.
With "Voltaire in Exile"
It never is alone.
In "Legends of the Patriarchs"
It never is "The Outcast,"
And "Socialism" claims this too,
Yet this is not the last.
In the "Holy Bible," now abridged,
You will therein it find.
"Beyond the Veil," yet in it is,
As this will call to mind.
In "Gottlieb, His Life," 'tis often stated,
With "Thomas Paine" alone
It ever will be related.
His "Rights of Man" without this
Could not very well stand.
In his "Common Sense," "The Crisis,"
Known all over this broad land.
The "Bennett-Teed Discussion"
Presents this pretty rough.
In "An Hour With the Devil"
You find this, sure enough.
In the "Outlines of Phrenology,"
Though strange to speak of this,
It (my last) is always in the Bible,
Which so many revere and kiss.
My friends, please seek, and seek and find.
A far-famed traveler it truly calls to mind.

BELT OF LIFE,

"WILSONIA"

IMPROVED

312 MYRTLE AVE.,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

For the Relief and Cure of All Forms of Disease in its Worst Stages.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, read the annexed letter from a well-known physician who attended the following remarkable case:

Mrs. L——, a lady residing in Brooklyn, E. D., for two year, suffered terribly with a uterine tumor; her attendant physician advised an operation, but having great aversion to the surgeon's knife, she would not submit to it; some friends having used my garments and been benefited thereby advised her to try them. About the middle of February, this year, a body set, as advised by myself, was purchased for her.

The following letter will show the results and prove the value of my improved appliances in all forms of disease:

MAY 2, 1884.

MR. D. J. COTTER, Dear Sir: Thinking you would like to know of the following, I notify you.

Mrs. L——, a patient of mine, had a uterine tumor of two years' standing and would not consent to an operation; some friends recommended her to use your MAGNETIC GARMENTS (a body set, I believe). Unbeknown to me she did purchase and wear them, for ten weeks, so she now informs me. Two days ago I was sent for to attend her and found the tumor had been expelled entire while standing, without pain or flow

Have you met with anything of this kind before by the application of your garments? I should be glad to have some information on the point Yours respectfully,

DR. A. R PETTIT,
149 Tompkins ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

COPY OF MY REPLY.

312 Myrtle ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

DR. A. R. PETTIT, Dear Sir: Your favor received. In reply I beg to say I have several such cases, some of many years' standing, cured by the use of my Garments. I would much like to see the tumor mentioned in your letter, if in your possession, if you will name a time I can call upon you. I will then give you all the information possible respecting the above-mentioned cases, and, if necessary, providing my patrons are willing, will place you in correspondence with them, or the physicians who attended them prior to the use of my Garments. I await your reply. Yours respectfully,

DAVID J. COTTER.

Dr. A. R. PETTIT having replied. I called upon him and saw the tumor; it was the fibrous tissue of a large one; all other matter seemed to have been absorbed (by the action of the Garments) before it was expelled. I fully satisfied him of other such cases by letters in my possession from parties cured and their physicians.

The above speaks for itself, as the full name and address of the physician is given, and I have no doubt but he will be pleased to satisfy any inquiring mind of the above facts. D. J. COTTER.

These garments are a decided improvement on anything of the kind ever offered, and only produced after many years of close study and scientific experiment.

Much depends upon the knowledge of how to apply such garments. Many persons have really good appliances to offer, but unless they are judiciously and scientifically applied they are valueless. Any person writing for pamphlet and information; by sending a full statement of their case, how long suffering, and all symptoms, would be advised free of cost, just what garment it would be necessary to use to effect a cure, price of same, etc. They are made to fit all parts of the body, easy of adjustment, and as comfortable to use as ordinary underwear; being well ventilated, they are cool, and the infusion of magnetism into the system produce a cool, pleasant feeling in the hottest weather, and will cure any of the following forms of disease: RHEUMATISM, GOUT, LUMBAGO, PARALYSIS, NEURALGIA, DYSPEPSIA, LOCOMOTOR ATAXIA, SPINAL DISEASE, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, DROPSY, TUMORS, CANCERS, and others not necessary to mention, as I claim that disease in any and all of its forms originates from one primary cause, a breaking up of the Ganglionic Nerves, preventing a flow of Odic or Vital force from the Medulla Oblongata at the base of the brain to various parts of the body (just as the severing of a telegraph wire would prevent the message being sent), the result being the iron particles in the blood become demagnetized; congestion and disease follow; if in the small of Back, Lumbago and Kidney trouble; in the shoulders, Rheumatism; in the Head, Nefralgia or Neuralgia, and so on in any part of the human organization. We have a thousand and one different names for disease, though produced by and through one source only, and it is by strengthening the Ganglionic Nerves, conserving the vital forces, and infusing magnetism into the system, I effect so many marvelous cures after all other means have failed.

REMARKABLE CURE OF PARALYSIS.

Nov. 13, 1883.

DAVID J. COTTER, Dear Sir: In reply to your inquiry as to the effects of the Garments sent me I am pleased to say the result has been astonishing to myself and friends. The first two pieces sent gave me such relief that I had great confidence of being entirely cured when I obtained the others, and I was not disappointed My paralysis has entirely disappeared and I am altogether a changed woman, and it is only two weeks since I got the full set. I suffered very much with weakness in my chest and lungs. Now I can sing and talk as well as ever, also read aloud without the slightest difficulty. I can safely recommend the garments to any persons suffering as I was.

MRS. E P. PLEASANTS,
Alderson, Monroe Co., West Va.

P. S.—My daughter has also found great relief from the use of your garments. See her note inclosed,

CURED OF NERVOUS PROSTRATION AND HYSTERIA.

DR. COTTER, Dear Sir: I am very happy to state that my general health has improved wonderfully since the application of your garments. From undergoing the operation to my eye my health had become fearfully impaired, until my attending physician feared for the results; but from the first ten days of wearing your garments I began to improve. I seemed to get new vitality, and with renewed health my sight got wonderfully better, until now I feel myself perfectly cured, and I am out of my physician's hands. I cannot feel too thankful for the benefit I have derived from your appliances and shall always bless the name of Dr. Cotter for his wonderful invention for curing disease without medicine.

Hoping thousands of others will be cured as I have been, I am, sir, Respectfully yours.

MISS MARY C. BURTON,
Alderson, Monroe Co., West Va.

CURED OF ASTHMA.

FEB. 4, 1884.

DR. D. J. COTTER, Dear Sir: I had suffered with Asthma for years in its worst form, and never found anything to help me until I put on your Garments, in February, 1883, since then my Asthma has disappeared, and I have not been troubled about breathing in the least.

Money could not buy the Garments I have if I could not get more.

I forward you this letter hoping it may be the means of inducing some poor sufferer to use your health-giving appliances, Yours very respectfully,

W. C. FARNHAM.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous Illustrations.

Prayer and Potatoes.

An old lady sat in her old arm-chair,
With wrinkled visage and disheveled hair,
And hunger-worn features;
For days and for weeks her only fare,
As she sat there in her old arm-chair,
Had been potatoes.

But now they were gone; of bad or good
Not one was left for the old lady's food
Of those potatoes;
And she sighed and said, "What shall I do?
Where shall I send, and to whom shall I go
For more potatoes?"

And she thought of the deacon over the way—
The deacon so ready to worship and pray—
Whose cellar was full of potatoes;
And she said: "I will send for the deacon to come;
He'll not mind much to giv me some
Of such a store of potatoes."

And the deacon came over as fast as he could,
Thinking to do the old lady some good,
But never, for once, of potatoes;
He asked her at once what was her chief want,
And she, simple soul, expecting a grant,
Immediately answered, "Potatoes."

But the deacon's religion didn't lie that way;
He was more accustomed to preach and pray
Than to giv his hoarded potatoes;
So not hearing, of course, what the old lady said,
He rose to pray, with uncovered head,
But she only thought of potatoes.

He prayed for patience, and wisdom, and grace,
But when he prayed, "Lord, giv her peace,"
She audibly sighed, "Potatoes;"
And at the end of each prayer which he said,
He heard, or thought that he heard, in its stead,
That same request for potatoes.

The deacon was troubled—knew not what to do;
'Twas very embarrassing to hav her act so
About "those carnal potatoes;"
So, ending his prayer, he started for home,
But, as the door closed, he heard a deep groan,
"Oh, giv to the hungry potatoes!"

And that groan followed him all the way home,
In the midst of the night it haunted his room,
"Oh, giv to the hungry potatoes!"
He could bear it no longer—arose and dressed;
From his well-filled cellar taking in haste
A bag of his best potatoes.

Again he went to the widow's low hut,
Her sleepless eyes she had not shut;
But there she sat in that old arm-chair,
With the same wan features, the same sad air;
And entering in he poured on the floor
A bushel or more from his goodly store
Of choicest potatoes.

The widow's heart leaped up for joy,
Her face was haggard and wan no more.
"Now," said the deacon, "shall we pray?"
"Yes," said the widow, "now we may."
And he kneeled him down on the sanded floor
Where he had poured his goodly store.

And such a prayer the deacon prayed
As never before his lips essayed,
No longer embarrassed, but free and full,
He poured out the voice of a liberal soul,
And the widow responded aloud, "Amen!"
But said no more of potatoes.

And you who hear this simple tale,
Pray for the poor, and praying "prevail;"
Then preface your prayer with alms and good deeds,
Search out the poor, their wants and needs;
Pray for peace, and grace, and spiritual food,
For wisdom, and guidance, for all these are good,
But don't forget the potatoes.

—J. T. Pattee.

"The Bible Analyzed."

I hav just read "The Bible Analyzed," a large and beautiful book, printed in clear and plain type, and in clear and plain language. It would seem as if all that could be said, either for or against this old book of Jewish mythology, had been said and repeated over and over again by so many writers that a new book, on the old thread-bare subject, could not possibly hav any interest. But I assure you that though I hav read from Voltaire and Paine up to Ingersoll, I was really fascinated by the easy, familiar, and flowing style of this volume of Kelso's. It is analytical, argumentativ, and historical; solid, sensible, and reasonable; merry humorous, and witty; cute, charming, and curious; and altogether useful, desirable, and valuable.

No Liberal library will be complete without it, and especially a League library. Hav you a pious friend or neighbor whom you would convince of the errors, mistakes, and falsehoods of the Bible? Persuade him to read this analysis of the holy (?) book, and the work is done.

Should some furious fanatic endeavor to thrust his stale and effete theology down your throat, tell him you will read any of the ten thousand pious books, from any pious theological library, that he will bring you, if he, in turn, will read "The Bible Analyzed," and that you will exchange criticisms and remarks thereon with him, ad infinitum; for you are just as certain to win the victory as the sun is sure to giv us light and life.

It would seem as though one such book as this would overturn the theology of the world, and so it would if it were universally read. But there are so few who care to search the foundations of their faith. They are born in the lap of theology, and reared among its mysteries and miracles, and its forms and ceremonies, so that to believe in them is as "natural as life," while to reject them requires study, thought, and effort.

I hope our friends will not only buy this book for its own intrinsic merit, but will choose it in preference to some others probably just as good. Select this one because the writer penned it amid poverty and destitution, penned it as a wounded and "almost totally disabled" soldier, who received his wounds in the service of our country, and is now trying to rear and educate his motherless children by the fruits of his pen.

I would like to place before you whole pages of this criticism on the blessed (?) volume, if I had space to do so, for I am sure if you knew the nature of the mental feast here spread for your delectation, you would be eager to partake of it.

If asked which is the most interesting chapter in the book, I think I would say the one on Miracles. He says: "Convince a Christian that no such miracles as described in the Bible were ever performed, and you at once make him an Infidel. So, on the other hand, convince an Infidel that the miracles described in the Bible are all genuin, and you at once make him a Christian. . . . The man who believes, does so simply because a sufficient amount of evidence has been brought to bear upon him to compel him to believe. . . . Anciently the word miracle was synonymous with the word wonder. A miracle was simply something wonderful. . . . The results of many scientific experiments appear truly wonderful—as the lighting of a fire with a drop of water, or with sparks from a man's nose; the converting of a cotton garment into its own weight of sugar; and the causing of large pieces of iron to stand in the air." All Christian Bible miracles, that are not myths and falsehoods, are probably "wonderful results of science," just as are the "wonders" reported of spiritual mediums of to-day.

"The Bible Analyzed" shows that the book is an irregular, straggling medley of fact and fiction, history and fable, poetry and nonsense, miracle and science. I was reading, only a few days ago, a serial story in the Continent, describing the persecutions of the early Christians and their underground life in the catacombs. The story made out the Christians to be "but a little lower than the angels," but for me the tale was ruined by its miracles. These were the restoring to life of two dead men, one of whom had his head entirely severed from his body. These were "raised" into life by the prayers of the congregation in the catacombs, and these two downright impossibilities made the whole story no better than a fable. Just so does the one miracle of turning all the waters of the land of Egypt into blood make the Bible no better than a book of fables; and then counting in all the other miracles Kelso mentions converts the old book into a collection far out-rivaling even Esop's famous volume.

Friends, the labor of two days will pay for "The Bible Analyzed." Mr. Kelso has spent years of study, and thought, and labor in producing this valuable legacy for Freethought. Can you grudge the work of two days if spent in purchase of what has cost so much? I think I am safe in offering to take the book off the hands of any Liberal at full price, if, on carefully reading it, he or she concludes it is not worth the outlay. Yours for the encouragement and appreciation of real merit,

ELMINA.

Opinions of Mrs. Slenker's Books.

M. E. BILLINGS: "The Darwins" and "John's Way" are excellent books.

G. S. BISHOP, Haven, Kansas: I am well pleased with "John's Way."

ORREN C. BURLINGAME, Bunville, N. Y.: Please send me the best book ever written to circulate among creedlings, viz., "John's Way."

H. O WAGES, Camlachie, Canada: Mrs. O. W. and I are delighted with "John's Way." This country wants more such literature as that in circulation.

DR. HARGRAVES: "John's Way" is a good work. It is very able. Besides, it is so useful that I think it would do all parents good if they read and studied it. The mode of education that is described in the work is not only interesting but highly instructiv.

"LIBERTY'S DISCIPLE:" The book market is deluged with trash; we are surrounded by a flabby literature. The intellectual and moral condition is appalling to the conscious thinker. Agreeable stories like "John's Way" and "The Darwins" are elevating and instructiv.

LYMAN CASE, Winsted, Conn.: I like "The Darwins," and fancy it will be the means of doing a great deal of good. I hope that Mrs. Slenker will keep on in the good work with her strong pen, and that she will liv long to convert all Virginia and the rest of mankind to good sense.

MR. R. FRANK, Mill, Wisconsin: "The Darwins" and "John's Way" will hav a powerful influence for good. Mrs. Slenker is very able; her stories are clothed in an attractiv garb, and in such plain language that they are brought within the comprehension of all of us. I love and venerate her writings.

"JOHN'S WAY."

OHIO Review: Young people should send for this little story. Old folks should buy it and giv it to some chain-bound friend, that it may be the means of freeing them from old theology. The Christian people distribute their publications throughout the world; should Liberals remain silent and let that which they are satisfied is false be forced upon the people without trying to counteract the influence?

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. MR. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intainsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers he world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure.

Yours respectfully,
WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by any one desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY; Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to the operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselvs. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle high than ordinary clothing.

Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Ladies' Abdominal Jackets and Gentlemen's Vests are made to order, and a fit guaranteed.

AGENTS WANTED IN EVERY TOWN IN THE UNITED STATES. LIBERAL COMMISSIONS ALLOWED

Address for further information,

DR. L. TENNEY,
471 West Madison Street, Chicago, Ill.

Please cut this petition out, attach it to a blank sheet of paper, sign your name and address to it, get all your friends and neighbors to do the same, and then send it to this office.

A PETITION FOR STATE SECULARIZATION.

To the Honorable Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress:

A republican form of government being based on liberty, equality, and fraternity, as both means and end, involves the separation of Church and State, whose union is the worst form of class-legislation and the most infallible sign of arbitrary power. A house divided against itself cannot stand. The institutions of this Commonwealth should be made homogeneous throughout. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of truth in whatever direction. Any infringement by government of this absolute equality of its citizens is the parent of manifold evil, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, this government was founded to "establish."

And yet, though the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," there does exist a union of Church and State, which gives to Christianity moral and material aid, and so proscribes other religions and forms of belief and unbelief, while taxing these also for the support of that special religion.

The ways in which this old alliance between Church and State still survives among us are:

1. Recognition of God and Christianity in State Constitutions.
2. Exemption of Church property from taxation.
3. Appropriations of public money for sectarian purposes.
4. Religious exercises, as the reading of the Bible, etc., in the public schools.
5. Laws enforcing the observance of the Sabbath on the authority of the Bible.
6. Religious test-oaths in courts of justice and on instalment into office.
7. Chaplaincies in the Legislature, the Army, and the Navy.
8. Fast and Thanksgiving Proclamations, which contain theological ideas that may or may not be acceptable to the citizen.

The necessity for this separation of Church and State is more apparent now than ever before, because of the still greater diversity of religious beliefs, the many forms of dissent from the religion which receives State patronage, and the growing signs of sectarian strife and ambition in the arena of politics. And emphasis needs to be given to the fact that the union of Church and State is a great hindrance to the employment of right methods in dealing with many questions of reform now demanding attention. And most essential is it at all times, and especially in the present, in order to secure for the law its due respect and observance, that the people's representatives should exhibit the strictest fidelity to their trusts by following the law in its letter and spirit.

Your petitioners, therefore, pray that immediate action be taken by the law-making power to bring into harmony the theory and practice of our government in making the following principle a part of the fundamental law of the land by amendment to the United States Constitution:

The total separation of Church and State, by prohibiting Congress or any State, County, Municipality, or Township from enacting any law that favors religion in any of the eight ways specified, or in any other way, or prohibits the free exercise thereof.

Odds and Ends.

IN politics the most successful men seem to be the ones who hav the greatest ginfluence.

WHEN did George Washington take his first ride? When he took a hack at the cherry-tree.

IT is noted as an interesting fact that the wages of sin hav not been cut down to any perceptible extent

THE cultured maiden from Boston wrote to her friend that she had just been to hear Mr. Joseph Emmett sing "Pique-a-bout."

IT is said that there will be three women to one man in heaven. Gosh! but won't we hav a nice time up there when we lay this burden down!

LITTLE FLAXEN HAIR: "Papa, it's raining." Papa: (somewhat annoyed by work in hand): "Well, let it rain." Little Flaxen Hair (timidly): "I was going to."

MAINE is noted more for its water-power than any thing else. Therefore it seems perfectly natural that its nativs snould take so kindly to the flowing bowl that a prohibition law is necessary.

A BUDDING poet recently sent a religious weekly a sonnet "To a Devil's Darning-Needle," and was greatly surprised at the sanctimoniousness of the said periodical when it printed his sonnet changed so that the title read, "To a Satan's D——g-Needle."

WE hav it on sound authority that the French government has resolved to return the exquisit courtesy of our lawmakers in kind. Hereafter a duty will be levied upon all works of art imported into France from America; and thirty per cent will be collected upon all American-made chromos and other works of art, such as tobacco labels, three-sheet pictorial posters, wooden Indians, Godblessourhome mottoes, pictures by National Academicians, advertising fans, please-shut-the-door signs, and nativ wines.

"NOW, my dear," said the candidate's wife, "I don't wish to throw the slightest obstacle in the way of your election, and if you choose to turn the house into a bear garden, and hav all the loafers in town tramping on my carpets and filling my curtains with pipe smoke and drinking whisky out of my best teacups, I shan't say a work. But I want you distinctly to understand that if another of those women's rights delegations comes to know if you are going to take a manly stand for down-trodden womanhood—well, that delegation has got to be twenty years older and keep its veil down, or I'll interview it myself. That's all, dear."

HOW CATHOLIC PATRIOTS SERVE THEIR COUNTRY.—AN OPERETTA OF THE HOUR.

SCENE.—The rear room of O'Flaherty's saloon. The patriots sit in secret council around a table on which are set out sundry bottles, glasses, etc.

FIRST PATRIOT.

Hurroo, byes, hurroo for the pathriot's trade;
A betther no mortal did iver invint;
To the divil I've flung away pick-axe and shpade,
And the tinimint's moine where I once paid me rint.
Sure, no longer I doine from a batthered tin can,
I've Dalmoniky's besht since I friz to this job;
Here's a health to ould England, she's med me a man,
For 'tis cursin' herself puts the bread in me gob.

SECOND PATRIOT.

'Tis navies we'll hav, byes—all here in me oi—
With Airin's green shtandart a-sailin' the says;
And we've dynamiote, too—here 'tis, labeled "Ould Roi"—
To bring down Johnny Bull to his dastardly knase.
Faix, the more of shtarvation and misery, too,
And shootin' and hangin' bedivils the Oile,
The betther it is, byes, for me and for you,
For the shtamps come in fasther and fasther the whoile.

THIRD PATRIOT.

Wan Rafferty keeps a schmall grocery shtore,
Where the woman that owns me was down on the schlate
Purty heavy, begob, till the villyun he shwore
Not a ha'porth on thrust anny more should we ate.
"Ye'd shtarve out a pathriot, would ye!" I said:
"For a thraitor and shpy I'll denounce ye, ye baste!"
Faix, Rafferty thrimbled. From that day, hedad,
Upon thrust on the besht of his havin' we faste!

(Cries of "Divil resaive him!" "More power to yees, Mick!")

FOURTH PATRIOT.

Ye know the bloind polper, byes, Terry McGlynn,
A nate little sum the ould bird had put boi
In the toe of a sock hid a tay-pot widin;
When Oi heerd of it, off, faix, to Terry wint Oi.
Oi discoorsed him, begor, of the want and the woe
The bloody red toirant had brought the green land,
And the tirrible vingeance we'd wrake on the foe—
Sure, he imptied the shtockin' right into me hand.

(Prolonged laughter.)

FIFTH PATRIOT.

"Arrah, where are yez bound," sez I, "Biddy O'Rorke?"
(She's a sarvint and soft). "Where so fasht now, Machree?"
"A passage to boi," sez she, "here to New York,
For the mother at home that I'm doyin' to see."
"Let her wait a while yit," sez I, "Biddy asthore."
And I shwore how the Gim of the Says wud be free,
Whin the pathriot byes had a few dollars more,
Till, half croyin', she gev all the money to me.

(Boisterous laughter, succeeded by cheering, and a voice, "Well, Reilly, ye bate the divil!")

ALL THE PATRIOTS [in chorus].

Hurroo, byes, hurroo for the Pathriot band,
And whin we git lift sure the day will be could,
The divil may care for the Imerald land,
While the money roulls into the Pathriots bould.
No longer we wrastle with shovel and shpade,
We're shtatesmen and warriors—that is our job.
Here's a health to ould England, our fortunes she's med,
For 'tis cursin' herself puts the bread in our gob.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 11. No. 25. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, June 21, 1884. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

JEWS hav been so persecuted by the Christians of Limerick lately that numbers hav left the city.

KING THEBAU of Burmah has poisoned his mother-in-law. Thus is Christian civilization doing its perfect work, even among the heathen.

THE Baptist darkies of New York hav just dedicated their first church. This will probably hav the effect of introducing the razor into religious worship.

EVERY religion, like every dog, so to speak, has its day. What Sunday is to Christians Monday is to the Greeks, Tuesday to the Persians, Wednesday to the Assyrians, Thursday to the Egyptians, Friday to the Turks, and Saturday to the Jews.

SOME of the electors in the south of London are said to contemplate bringing forward Miss Helen Taylor as a Parliamentary candidate at the next election. They believe there is no legal obstacle to the election of a woman, although women hav not a Parliamentary vote.

A NEBRASKA girl recently took the first prize for blowing the largest soap-bubble at a church social. As the blowing of soap-bubbles is more a question of wind than anything else, we may soon hear of its becoming a popular pastime among religious people. The average pastor would hav a walk-over.

"PAPA," asked a little boy, looking up from his Sunday-school lesson, "what are the 'wages of sin?'" "The wages of sin these days," replied the old man, earnestly, "depend upon circumstances, and one's opportunities and business capacity. But they run up into the thousands, my boy, they run up into the thousands."

IN the last census of France no less than seven and a half millions registered themselvs as having no religion. Hundreds of curacies remain vacant in that country for want of young priests. The Chamber of Deputies has refused to allow the exemption of ecclesiastical pupils from the three years' military service by the overwhelming majority of 386 to 91.

Two bank cashiers dropped out of their places one day last week from the usual cause, and a third began his term of eight years in jail. It was not a very good day for cashiers, either; but it is apparent that there is a good deal of moral as well as of other liquidation going on just now. The returns so far show all to hav been Sunday-school superintendents, deacons, and church-members.

ONE of the most suggestiv strokes of irony upon the rottenness and hypocrisy of modern life, says "Honorius" in the Irish World, is the fact that among the items of outrageous vandalism on the part of the president of the failed Metropolitan bank was the snug sum of $1,000,000 which he had stolen whereby to endow a Methodist theological college. Whether a thief or a saint endows a theological seminary does not probably affect the merits of the theology, but suspicious human nature is ultimately to discredit the sources of such theological teaching in the belief that the theological teachers were more or less in conspiracy with the banking thief.

A MAINE paper relates that a Portland man, who reads the scriptures a great deal, after reading an account of Jesus walking on the water, decided that he himself had faith sufficient to walk at least over to the cape, and told his friends of his intention. Accordingly, several gentlemen gathered at the end of Custom House wharf to witness the performance. The man of faith was there, but as he had prudently provided himself with two life preservers to use in case his faith gave out, there was so much ridicule of him that he did not attempt the feat of walking upon the water. These schemes for transplanting the achievements of an age of fiction into this era of fact seem destined in every case to "fall through at both ends."

ROBERT LEITHAM, an Irishman, 80 years of age, has just landed in New York for the second time. He is looking for the Rev. John Rodney. When he was here many years ago, the Rev. Rodney borrowed $2,000 of him, and then sent him back to Ireland, telling him he would send him $3 per week during the rest of his life. Leitham has never received any money, and worked his way to this country hoping that Rodney would make him reparation.

QUEEN VICTORIA has just attained her sixty-fifth year, an age which has been exceeded by nine only of the sovereigns of England, dating from the Norman conquest, viz.: Henry I. and Edward I., who both attained 67 years; Queen Elizabeth, who lived 69 years; James II., 68 years; George I., 67 years; George II., 77 years; George III., 82 years; George IV., 68 years, and William IV., 72 years. On June 20th she will hav reigned over the United Kingdom for forty-seven years, a length of time which has been exceeded by three of the kings of England only, viz.: Henry III., who reigned fifty-six years; Edward III., whose reign reached fifty years, and George III., whose reign lasted nearly sixty years. Victoria is also the oldest European monarch, with three exceptions—the emperor of Germany, who is 67 years of age; the king of the Netherlands, 67; and the king of Denmark, 66.

THE Christian at Work makes this statement: An industrial school for candidates for the ministry in order to be able to support themselvs while studying, is urged by Bishop Gallagher, of Louisiana. "A garden farm," he says, "devoted to the cultivation of small fruits and vegetables, could be easily cared for by young men assembled for a course of study, and the proceeds of their labor would make the perpetual endowment of the institution." Mr. Peck, of the Milwaukee Sun, seconds the motion ably as follows: "The experience of watermelon farmers and raisers of fruit in the vicinity of theological seminaries would go far to prove that such farming would be right in the hands of the students. They are said to be a great help to farmers in harvesting their crops, and to do the work after study hours, late at night, and they ask no pay. In fact, it is hard to find out who does the night work. They hide their light under a fence."

THE new French divorce bill which has passed the lower house allows either husband or wife to obtain a divorce for cause of adultery, cruelty, serious insults, a sentence of imprisonment for dishonesty or offenses against public morals, any ignominious punishment other than banishment or degradation for political offenses, absence for a term of years. It also provides for divorces by mutual consent. In the latter case it provides that any couple finding their married life insupportable, but not wishing to accuse each other of any offenses nullifying marriage, can make a declaration that they are no longer able to liv together. This formal declaration must be supported by the acquiescence of three of the nearest relativs of both husband and wife, and repeated four times in the course of a year. Then a separation is granted, and at the end of three years an absolute divorce, allowing each party to re-marry. Should this bill become a law, and it seems likely to, the Chicago courts can not hold a candle to those of Paris.

A SHORT time ago a lady of Saco, Me., was reported to hav been miraculously cured of consumption by the power of prayer. The tidings of great joy were telegraphed all over the country. Nevertheless, for the perfect recovery of the patient, a supplementary petition to the throne was deemed necessary, and the help of a noted faith doctor was invoked. This fellow appointed a recent Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock for her friends to join in special prayer for her recovery. His idiotic instructions were carried out. When asked by her husband if she felt better, the sufferer replied, "No, but I feel very strangely," and in a short time she was dead, and the believers lost faith in the power of prayer. The editor of the Maine Banner deplores these proceedings as a course that leads to the rankest Infidelity and skepticism. The day of miracles, he holds, is past. He admits that the realm of prayer is boundless, but does not believe that it extends to the cure of a person in the last stages of consumption, or to the healing of a sprained ankle. Thus another miracle turns out to be, what everyone of them is and has been—a fraud.

THE religious bigots of Boston having imported Gen. Carey, of Ohio, to answer the arguments of Col. Ingersoll against the alleged myths of the Bible, the general held forth at the Tremont Temple on Monday evening last. The seats on the floor were about half filled, with a sprinkling of spectators in the lower galleries. The daily papers report the speech of Gen. Carey as a very tame reply to Col. Ingersoll, which it was. As the speaker wished to impress the idea upon his hearers, he would walk forward to the edge of the platform, and doubling himself up so as to place his hands upon his knees, would tell off the points by nodding his head very knowingly. He said, among other things, that Noah's ark was 43,413 tons measurement, more than the burden of eighteen of our largest men-of-war vessels which carry three hundred men, and provisions enough to last them for a year. He also said that there were not over four hundred quadrupeds in all the ark, and that the birds couldn't hav taken up much room. "When it was remembered that the ark was three stories high," said the speaker, "and all fitted up into compartments, there was room enough for all the animals, besides a suite apiece for Noah and his numerous children, and several spare chambers for visitors!" Much more similar verbiage was given to prove Ingersoll was wrong and the Noah Bible myths truth. If the appearance of the countenances of the hearers was any criterion of their thoughts, very little stock was taken in the address. The theologians here who hire people to come to Boston to antagonize Freethought lecturers for the purpose of bolstering up their effete creeds, must secure the services of abler men than Gen. Carey of Ohio. Even then they will not succeed. It is high time that the religious myths of the ages should giv place to the common sense and reason of enlightened humanity.—Banner of Light.

CAPT. KELLY, of Hudson, Wis., has applied for a patent on an improved device for holding hymn-books in church. This will fill a want long felt. There is nothing that tires a man more than to stand up in church and hold a hymn-book while the congregation is singing, and nine able-bodied men in ten will hold on to one side of a book and not lift at all, but leave the party holding the other side of the book to bear up under the burden. What a sigh of relief comes from a man when the last verse of a hymn is reached, and how natural it is to begin to close the book when the second line of the last verse is being sung, and how he drops into his seat with a dull thud before the notes of the organ cease! A man that will stand up and walk around a pool-table half the night trying to corral balls in corner pockets, will get so tired in an hour in a church that he wants rest. A man who can put up a pair of twenty-pound dumb-bells, and whose muscles stand out like whip-cord, will get so tired holding a hymn-book that he will actually turn pale. A man who can row a boat all day trolling for black bass, and never feel the effect of his exercise, will stand up in church with a thumb and fingers on one side of a hymn-book, and a frail little woman on the other side will take hold with both hands and bear all the weight, and sing like an angel, while the wicked man is languidly touching the good book, looking straight ahead over the pulpit, and thinking of a horse race or a baseball match. These things are wrong; but it is well that a hymn-book rest is to be furnished, because with such a contrivance a man will hav to brace up and do his share of the work. The cry to "giv us a rest," which has so long been heard in the land, is at last to be answered, and when the hymn-book rests are upon the market, and the wicked man is harnessed up with one of them under his arm, he will look like a scissors-grinder, and he will be ashamed of himself.—Peck's Sun.

Vivisection of Babies.—A Danish Vivisector's Sacrifice of his Own Child.

E. B. FOOTE, JR., ANSWERED ONCE MORE.

I clip the following from the Zoophilist for March of the current year:

"A Danish physician living at Samso has had, it seems, the honor of inaugurating a new stage in the progress of experimentation. He has been trying how to produce tuberculosis in his own baby. For half a year or thereabouts, he caused the infant to be fed with milk from a cow suffering from the disease. It was intended to test the 'interesting' circumstance whether such food would engender tuberculosis in the child. As usual, there was some uncertainty in the results. The poor infant has suffered from some form of scrofula, but 'doctors differ' as to whether it be—or be not—the consequence of the diseased cow's milk wherewith its scientific parent so tenderly provided it. The case is debated in the 11th volume of the 'Scandinavian Medical Archives.'"

The italics are my own. The Zoophilist, from which I copy it, is a very able journal of London, England, devoted entirely to combating vivisection, and is the organ of the "Victoria Street Society for Protecting Animals Liable to Vivisection," of which I hav frequently spoken in previous articles. Hence the truth of the statement may be relied upon as being above question.

This horrible offering up by a father of his own child, in the interests of vivisection, is the just and legitimate outcome of a monstrous system of cruelty, outrage, and wrong. Its (vivisection's) terrible effects upon its disciple in this instance had obliterated in the heart of the inhuman father, not only every spark of parental affection, but had transformed him into a very demon, delighting apparently in the prolonged torture of his little, helpless child.

I appeal to the reason—to the affections—of my readers. How long shall those monsters of cruelty, the vivisectors, hav their way in free, enlightened America?

Mothers, ye know not the hour when your own little ones may be in danger, for the "lust for cruelty" (as it has been most fitly called) knows no bounds when once aroused in the human breast. Think you a monster (I cannot say a man) like this Danish physician would hesitate to kidnap a child which had strayed from its home—a monster who had already immolated upon the bloody altar of the Moloch of modern science his own defenseless little child?

It is unsafe to permit a pet animal to go out of one's sight in many large cities, as the dog-stealers (who often steal solely to sell to vivisectors and physiological laboratories) are on the alert to capture all dogs unprotected by the presence of their masters, and to deliver them over to their patrons, the ruthless vivisectors. I saw it stated, some time since, and upon reliable authority, that in Lyons dogs were (on account of the great demand for them in the vivisecting schools of that city) actually becoming scarce, and that it was seriously proposed to breed them solely to supply the vivisectors. As strange as the idea may seem to those who hav given but little thought to the subject, there is a very strong suspicion in my mind that a few, at least, of the many children which are lost every year (mostly belonging to poor parents who hav no adequate means of ascertaining their fate), hav fallen into the clutches of these scientific (?) monomaniacs. Certain, beyond question, is it that, from time immemorial, it has been the burning, unquenchable thirst of vivisectors to obtain human victims. This is illustrated by the serious proposition of two of that fraternity recently, through the columns of a highly respectable London newspaper, that condemned criminals should be given to them for vivisection, instead of being relegated to the hangman; also by the Danish vivisector mentioned above, who sacrificed his own child. A few hundred years ago in Europe (as I stated in a former article), many condemned men and women were at different times given over to the tender mercies of the vivisectors.

Now, my esteemed readers (and, for the most part, I think I can safely say friends as well), if you love humanity and justice—if you would protect all human and brute creatures from these demons, in this and coming generations, in our own dear land of liberty, exert, now and henceforth, all your influence in the localities where you reside, to educate and enlighten your children and neighbors in this matter. Form, wherever practicable, clubs or small societies, all members of which shall be pledged to oppose this terrible crime by every means within their power. The meetings need entail no expense, as they can be conveniently held at the houses of members. Depend upon it, sooner or later great efforts will be made in favor of vivisection throughout the United States, the more particularly as it appears not unlikely that it may, before many years, be made illegal in the leading countries of Europe; strong shoulders are at the wheel, particularly in England, to prohibit it, but the struggle is most bitter upon the part of the vivisectors, so that it may yet be long before right shall triumph. Meanwhile, here, much vivisection is already practiced (although little, as compared to what is practiced in European countries). Now, then, is the proper time to educate the children and the masses in regard to this matter, so that they will not only demand that that now practiced be discontinued (for the sake of humanity and true progress), but that it may become impossible to spread the evil, under the sanction of the law. Licensing vivisection appears only to make the matter much worse; such, at least, has been the case in Great Britain, where an act granting licenses was passed some eight or nine years ago. It serves only to protect the vivisectors instead of the animals. Hence, my readers, never favor the licensing of vivisection, for it is only a cloak for concealing the crimes of science; insist upon absolute, unconditional prohibition of it, or things will be made worse, not better! Particularly let those among you who can do so, write up the subject for the local press, and encourage public discussion upon it. I am certain that this Victoria Street Society (1 Victoria street, London, S.W., England,) will gladly forward such printed matter to all interested parties as they may require, as well as furnish all desired information upon the subject, as to the best method of organizing anti-vivisection societies, etc., etc.

The editor of the Zoophilist evidently holds opinions similar to my own, relativ to the sentiments of the advocates of vivisection regarding the point of sacrificing children to that science (?), for, in the same issue in which I find the above account of the Danish physician and his child, I find also the following:

"The parallel between the old antislavery agitation and our own grows constantly more close. We can remember when an advocate of negro slavery denounced as a traitor to his country the man who should refuse to 'send back his mother into slavery.' We shall soon hav advocates of vivisection who will denounce the mother who will not devote her infant to pathological research (vivisection)."

Lest it be supposed (as E. B. Foote, Jr., would hav his and my readers suppose) that the experiments I hav described in previous articles upon vivisection be exceptional and rare, I will copy a few more, taken almost at random, from reliable books upon the subject. 1. "Majendie" (the subject of a poem of my own in a recent paper published in this journal), sacrificed 4,000 dogs in order to establish the distinction between the sensitiv nerves and the nerves of motion, and then sacrificed 4,000 others to prove that he was mistaken" (Henry Bergh).

2. Testimony of David Ferrier, M.D. (vivisector), Professor of Kings College, before the Royal Commission:

"Question: What is your practice as to anesthetics? Answer: Except for teaching purposes, or convenience, I never giv them.

"Q. Do you mean to say that you hav no regard at all for the sufferings of animals? A. No regard at all! I think that a man who performs an experiment has no time for thinking what the animal will feel and suffer.

"Q. Do you believe it the general practice on the continent to disregard altogether the feelings of animals? A. I do.

"Q. Do you believe that the feeling is different in England? A. I do not think it is; not among physiologists."

3. "I hav expressed publicly in the press that anesthetics, on the whole, hav been curses rather than benefits to the animals. The public hav generally supposed that anesthetics were used, and hence they did not feel called on to make any demonstration to save animals from pain, and all the while animals were suffering, and consequently anesthetics had served more to lull the public than the animals" (Testimony before the Royal Commission of George Goggin, M.B., formerly of Her Majesty's Navy).

4. The Medical Times and Gazette flippantly mentions an experiment on a living dog, which consisted in forcing half a pint of boiling water into the stomach, "in order to show that the animal tissue could be disorganized; and that the animal, after giving evidence of great suffering, vomited blood and died!"

5. Mr. Jesse B. Mills testified before the Royal Commission as follows:

"I am a veterinary surgeon in the Royal Artillery at Woolwich.

"Question: You went through college at Edinburgh? Answer: I did.

"Q. Were experiments made there on the occasion to which you refer, to discover any new facts? A. No; simply to demonstrate things that were perfectly well known to every student, almost; and to gratify idle curiosity.

"Q. What kind of animals were used? A. Cats and dogs.

"Q. How were they obtained? A. By hunting them down in the streets at night; and sometimes by a poisoned bait, after which antidotes were used, and the animals restored to animation.

"Q. In the operations performed were anesthetics used? A. None whatever.

"Q. What animals were operated on simply for demonstration? A. Horses and donkeys.

"Q. Were the operations painful ones? A. Very; the animals were cast by means of hobbles.

"Q. Were experiments made on any particular part of the animals? A. No; they were made all over.

Q. Were they destroyed immediately after operating? A. No; they were allowed to liv about twelve or fourteen hours.

"Q. Are students also permitted to practice on the horse? A. Yes."

6. Listen to what Brachet, a French physiologist, has to say of himself: "I inspired a dog with great aversion for me by plaguing or inflicting some pain or other upon it as often as I saw it. When this feeling was carried to its hight, so that the animal became furious as soon as it saw or heard me, I put out its eyes. I could then appear before it without its manifesting any aversion. I spoke, and immediately its barkings and furious movements proved the passion which animated it. I destroyed the drums of its ears, and disorganized the internal ear as much as I could. When intense inflammation had rendered him deaf, I filled up his ears with wax. He could no longer hear at all. Then I went to his side, spoke aloud, and even caressed it, without his falling into a rage; it seemed even sensible of my caresses."

Commenting upon the above "experiment," Mr. Henry Bergh justly says: "And what was all this to prove? Why, simply that if one brute has an aversion to another, it does not feel or show that aversion when it has no means of knowing that the other brute is present."

7. George Richard Jesse testified before the Royal Commission as follows: "I am prepared to amply and fully establish that the cruelties of vivisection are not surpassed by any recorded in the history of mankind, by furnishing extracts from the books written by these men themselvs; . . . that these practices are becoming a moral ulcer, tending to demoralize mankind and vitiating the minds of the young."

8. I transcribe the following from Paul Bert's work, the "Archives of Physiology," vol. ii, p. 650:

"Under the skin of a middle-sized dog, six centigrammes of curare [one of the most frightfully painful poisons known], in the solid state, were inserted, and as many grammes of the same substance, dissolved in water, were also injected. A few minutes afterward the animal staggered on its fore paws, walking on the tips of the toes; he then fell and presented all the signs of being poisoned by curare. . . . He gave out a large quantity of viscid saliva, and wept very much. I then opened the windpipe, and inserted the nozzle of a pair of bellows, to which an intermittent motion was given by a machine worked by water. In this way an artificial respiration was kept up. The pneumogastric nerve was then laid bare and tied, and the same was done with the sciatic nerve [two of the most sensitiv nerve-trunks in the entire body, the dog's sensibility meanwhile remaining absolutely unimpaired]. During ten hours the action of the nerves was examined hourly. After ten hours of artificial respiration, the animal became three or four degrees colder, and the next morning it was dead!"

Mr. Goggin thus comments upon the diabolical act:

"Here is a dog under curare during ten hours, upon whom the action of the pneumogastric and sympathetic nerves remains intact—or, in plain English, a dog was first rendered helpless and incapable of any movement, even breathing, which function was performed by a machine blowing through a hole in its windpipe. All this time, however, its intelligence, its sensitivness, and its will remained intact; a condition accompanied by the most atrocious suffering that the imagination of man can conceive! In this condition the side of the face, the side of the neck, the side of the fore leg, the interior of the belly, and the hip were dissected out, in order to lay bare the various nerves, and these were excited by electricity for ten mortal hours, during which the animal must hav suffered unutterable torment, unrelieved even by a cry! And the crowning discovery made by the merciless tormentor, and to which he called special attention, is that during these tortures the miserable creature urinated."

And he concludes:

"The inquisitors then left for their homes, leaving the tortured victim alone, with the clanking engin still working upon it, till death came in the silence of the night and set the sufferer free!"

I do not know what effect the perusal of the above account will hav upon my readers, but well do I recall the sensation of sickening horror which crept over me when I first read those terrible lines. "The effect of curare itself," says Mr. Bergh, "is horrible beyond conception, and even Claude Bernard is of the same opinion. What, then, must hav been the agony of this helpless creature?" And this same curare (in well-nigh universal use by vivisectors) is what that gentry try to palm off upon the lay public as being an anesthetic, in order to proceed unmolested in their devilish work.

Where are you now, Mr. Foote, with your pretty fables about the mildness of experiments in vivisection? Is there anything yet remaining of them or you (as a logician)? You espoused a weak and a wicked cause, and you hav not only succeeded in proving yourself as ignorant (or worse) in regard to what you set yourself about to prove, but your disastrous failure has had the entirely unintentional effect (on your part) of letting in a flood of light upon those hideous dungeons and charnel-houses where these nameless atrocities are daily and hourly being perpetrated. I believe I am now through with you, having no desire to further chastise one whose last feeble defense has disappeared before the army of incontrovertible facts which I hav collated. I take no credit to myself for your discomfiture; you could not but fail, for you were in the wrong, and in your position I should hav made no better figure than you now do.

Before closing this paper I desire to express my warmest thanks to Mr. Eugene M. Macdonald for his extreme courtesy in according the subject of vivisection so generous a space in the columns of this journal. My heartfelt thanks are also due Harvey W. Pinney, Esq., Mrs. Mattie C. Mitchell, and J. L. Tompkins, Esq.

I had written thus far on the present article when THE TRUTH SEEKER brought me E. B. Foote, Jr.'s, three and one-half column reply to my last open letter to him, as well as Mr. Pinney's letter, in which I notice he (Mr. Pinney) suggests, as I hav, that some of the more ardent among the vivisectors (such, for instance, as the Danish physician of whose exploits I speak in this present paper), may possibly know more of the fate of certain strayed little ones whose fate has never been known, than they would like to tell. Surely a man who would slowly and systematically poison his own child would not hesitate to do the same or worse with others whom he could safely entrap.

Now a few words for Mr. Foote, relativ to his latest. He accuses me of great cruelty in informing noble-hearted Mrs. Mitchell and the other truth seekers of these atrocities, upon the principle, I presume, that it is better the defenseless animals should continue to be vivisected indefinitly than that the sensibilities of men and women should be roused to indignant protest by a clear presentation of the subject in all its horrors. This is, I take it, about the weakest plea he has yet advanced, and the most difficult to support by common sense. That Mr. Bergh has hitherto failed in securing legislation against vivisection is the best of reasons why philanthropists should redouble their endeavors to overcome and enlighten the apathetic indifference manifested by our legislators and the people at large in our country. In England and Germany columns of the leading dailies are filled with the discussion of vivisection, and, as I elsewhere said, a license law, supposably regulating its practice, has been passed in the former country.

Mr. Foote advances the old, worn-out plea of the gentleness of soul characterizing vivisectors, but I think the earlier portion of this article sufficiently exposes both the motiv and the hollowness of such a claim.

He also has much more to say of the cruelty of butchering, killing seals, etc. I admit all this is cruel, and should be stopped, but why does he, on that account, quarrel with me in my endeavor to suppress another and far more horrible cruelty? Mr. Foote professes to be horrified at Professor Mantegazza's exploits, but Mantegazza by no means stands alone. How about the famous—or, rather, infamous—Professor Schiff, who in ten years experimented upon fourteen thousand dogs, given over to him by the municipality of Florence, returning their bodies so mangled that the man who had contracted for their skins found them useless? During the same ten years Schiff vivisected, in addition to these fourteen thousand dogs, a number of pigeons, cats, and rabbits, which swelled the total to some seventy thousand creatures. How is this for the work of a single vivisector? He was evidently not one of those who contented themselvs with "scratching a newt's tail."

Driven from Florence at last by the indignant inhabitants, Schiff sought refuge in that paradise of true vivisectors, Switzerland, and he is now pursuing his diabolical trade at Geneva, where he at last accounts was "using" two dogs per week. My article is already long, and hence I can touch only briefly upon the major points that Mr. Foote brings up. I repeat again, and most emphatically, that nothing of importance has been discovered by vivisection, and the claims which Mr. Foote advances hav been again and again disproved, nor do many vivisectors make what they know to be such empty boasts. Bernard died very recently, and there appears to exist no reasonable doubt that he was honest enough at the end of his career to admit that his labors were all in vain. Mr. Foote calls me a "mere literary feller." His stock of what Mrs. Partington would hav called "opprobrious epitaphs" must hav run low if he feels obliged to taunt a man with being a professional writer. At any rate, I am in the same boat with my superior officers, Bennett, Ingersoll, Chainey, and Watts, and I think I can stand it if Mr. Foote can.

The discovery of the circulation of the blood, attributed to Harvey—although doubtless known to the ancient Greeks and Chinese—was not, as Mr. Foote states, discovered by him (Harvey) through vivisection, but, according to his own recorded words, by watching, with a magnifying glass, the heart pulsating "in wasps, flies, and transparent shrimps, as through a window." The discovery of the other matters to which Mr. Foote refers are all either failures themselvs, or else were gained from other sources than vivisection.

In conclusion, let me once more most cordially thank Mr. Macdonald for the generous space he has accorded both sides of the controversy to date, therein manifesting the tolerant and unprejudiced spirit of a true Liberal. ELLIOTT PRESTON.

6 Park Square, Boston, Mass.

P. S.—A single word relativ to the medical men to whom Mr. Foote refers, who, in the interests of science, inoculated their own bodies with syphilitic virus. It appears to me that any man who knowingly inflicts upon himself one of the most terrible and loathsome diseases that afflict mankind is little short of a scientific monomaniac, and, unless he has absolutely decided to forever eschew the office of paternity, he is nothing short of a criminal; for although he has the indubitable right to make of his individual body a lazar-house, he could upon no pretense be justified in entailing the most terrible of all hereditary diseases upon his children's children. I may add that I am not so ignorant of medicin as Mr. Foote believes, having made it a study and been a regular attendant at hospital practice for years. E. P.

The Tariff and Labor.

MR. STEPHENSON.

I hav read with satisfaction Mr. Stebbins's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER on the tariff question. His points are self-evident and conclusiv. I agree with Col. Ingersoll that any party that proposes a return to free trade will need protection at the polls. But we of the Pacific coast wonder how those who advocate protection for the benefit of labor can be so one-sided or blind as to advocate the importation of Chinese. What benefit the protectiv tariff can be to the American laboring people when it is so easy to reduce wages to a level with pauper slave labor of China is a mystery to us. Mr. C. C. Johnson, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 8th, quotes triumphantly a letter from the San Francisco Chronicle with Wendell Phillips's name attached, in which the following curious sentence appears: "In the first place, I hav no fears of the Chinese coming here in such numbers as even temporarily to disturb our welfare. Nations emigrate gradually; never in tens of millions at a time." Whoever wrote that—I don't believe Wendell Phillips was the author—must hav made an extraordinary effort to be oblivious to the facts patent to thinking men and women. Over one-third of the laborers on this coast are Chinese. Not one of them cares a nickel for the welfare of our country or its institutions. Not one of them expects to remain and make it his home. They come to get the benefit of our glorious prosperity—and take it away. They are the completest instrument for making the "rich richer and the poor poorer" ever discovered by heartless greed. Chinamen tell me that wages for a grown man in China are from $2 to $25 per year. They can be brought to California for $10 a head. There must be at least a hundred millions of laboring men in China. They are quite as well informed of the advantages to be gained by coming here as we are.

Of course it is selfishness in us that we are not willing to giv up our riches to the poor of Asia. We havn't enough to benefit them a great deal if we giv it all to them. The Chinese are superior to us in several things. They are so perfectly satisfied with an absolute form of government that they havn't even the capacity to understand any other form. They put up with beatings and all manner of degrading abuse. They will work for half what an American demands, and lay up money, every dollar of which they send to China.

It cannot too often be urged that the Chinese build up no industry. He only crowds out white men from those already started, by his power to liv on "rice and rats."

Of course the time will come at last when conditions will be equalized all over the world; when America will be no better place for the laboring poor than Asia, but we beg that our brethren of the East will think before forcing us down to the Chinese level. Don't be in a hurry. Let them come up some. We want our children to enjoy part of the fruits of our labor. Hair-splitting philanthropy may demand Communism run to seed, if by thought and industry we succeed in building up comfortable homes, and making it so that the "star of hope shines over the cradle of the poor man's babe," we must allow selfish greed to interpose millions of coolies between the hope and its fruition!

Every advocate of a protectiv tariff knows that cheap labor can be of no permanent good to us. They know that a good home market must be backed up by well paid labor How can we hav well paid labor if capitalists hav power to import unlimited numbers of laborers from China for ten dollars a head that will work for five dollars per month or less? Don't try to humbug people by telling them that we overdraw the danger. Pause and think. Californians are not all hoodlums, as most Eastern papers try to make you believe. Four years ago we took a vote on the further importation of Chinese in that state. Our ballot is secret, and no coercion was resorted to. The result was 160,000 against Chinese immigration, and 800 for it.

I wish to say to every humanitarian that is now so loudly condemning us for our position on this question, that if the time comes when they are compelled to wrestle with the Chinese as we hav for twenty years past, they will view their present shortsightedness as a piece of insanity.

I believe in the protectiv tariff, but do not believe in the propriety of robbing the laboring man of all its good fruits by the importation of Chinese to starve our own people T. R. STEPHENSON.

TARIFF AND THE FARMER.

If you will kindly allow me the courtesy of using a small amount of your valuable space, I will endeavor to notice a few ideas on tariff presented by Mr. S. Stebbins in your issue of the 15th.

First he says that for sixty years he has been an earnest advocate of protectiv tariff, his main object being the incalculable benefits it confers on the agriculturists. In what way? we would like to ask. Is it by building up a spoliation system, by giving a favored class the power to rob and despoil him of his hard earnings, while they revel in luxury bought with the money they hav legally stolen under the guise of protectiv tariff? If that is what the gentleman calls benefit we want none of it. What is the aim of protectiv tariff but to hinder foreign competition with certain favored home manufactures, and how is this accomplished but by taxing the consumer of foreign goods from twenty to one hundred per cent, averaging, I believe, about forty-five per cent? What is the result of this advantage given our manufacturers? They raise the price of their goods to as near the price of foreign goods, including tariff, as possible, and still undersell them, thus giving them the advantage of from fifteen to eighty-five per cent in the selling market. The perfection of protectiv tariff policy would be to effectually prohibit the importation of foreign goods and giv home manufacturers the sole monopoly of the market, thus leaving the consumer at the mercy of a greedy and not too conscientious class of people, who would not be slow to take the advantage. While tariff is to some extent a local question—that is, all sections do not suffer alike its benefits and injuries, and we are not loth to admit that in some sections, such as Pennsylvania, New York, and, in fact, all of the states where the principal industry is manufacturing, it may be of some benefit to the farmer, yet we do persistently maintain that in the great agricultural district known as the Mississippi valley it is a positiv detriment, a burden for which they get no recompense. First, it compels the farmer to pay for everything in the way of manufactured goods, a price artificially enhanced by tariff, while the products of the farmer get no protection or no benefit. It compels him to buy in a restricted market, while he has to sell in a free market, under the open competition of the whole world. When he ships a bushel of wheat to Liverpool he has to compete with all other wheat shipping countries. He has got to successfully compete with the serfs of Russia or he cannot sell; and it would seem from his talk that Mr. Stebbins had yet to learn that it is what the farmer gets for what he exports that fixes the price of his products, and not what he sells at home. When he takes a load of wheat to market the grain-dealer will giv him what it is worth at the sea-port from which it is shipped, less the cost of transportation, and allowing him a profit, and the shipper will giv the grain-dealer what it is worth in Liverpool, less the cost of shipping, and allowing him a profit also. Thus the farmer has to bear all the expense of transportation, which so far as it is done on railways is double what it should be on account of the tariff on steel rails, and is a great deal more than it should be on the ocean on account of having to hire foreign vessels; for there is very little shipping done on vessels owned by this government or even private lines. He has to pay at least two profits, and, in fact, bear all expenses, and when his wheat is in Liverpool has to compete with all wheat-shipping countries. If he takes a load of wheat to mill to be ground into flour for home consumption, the mills will giv what his wheat is worth in market. Thus it is plainly to be seen that it is not what he sells at home that fixes the price, but what he exports. Now if he was allowed to buy where he sells, or where he could buy cheapest, we would see no cause to complain. This he is not allowed to do without paying from twenty to ninety per cent ad valorem duty, simply for the protection of infant industries which, they claim, would not be self-supporting without this advantage in market and prices. Is this benefiting the agriculturist? Is this justice, is this equality? Is it really consistent with the principles of a republican form of government? Is it not, rather, commercial slavery? Let me say to you, brother farmers, and say truly, that free trade is but another issue for freedom; a struggle for liberty, which you must fight for yourselvs, not with the sword but the ballot. Then let us not cease to agitate till we hav laid this monstrous evil to rest beside its twin brother, chattel slavery.

We shall see how protectiv tariff givs us a home market for our crops. The following table tells the tale:

	VALUE GROWN.	VALUE EXPORTED.
1850,	$125,000,000	$643,795. Exp't per cent, .005
1860,	170,000,000	4,076,704. " " 2 1-3
1870,	305,000,000	47,171,226. " " 14
1880,	425,000,000	190,546,305. " " 36

We hav at present a home market for only sixty-four per cent of our wheat, and depend on foreign markets for thirty-six per cent of it. Whereas, in the old free-trade times we had a home market at the very worst for ninety-seven and one-half per cent, and had to depend on foreign for only two and one-half per cent of our wheat. This shows us that the agricultural interest has progressed not on account of tariff, but in spite of it. And now I will giv a few statistics from Hon. Henry J. Phillpot's work on "Free Trade and Protection:

THE FARMER'S PRICES UNDER LOW TARIFF.

	WHEAT.	CORN.	BEEF.	PORK.
1855	$1.694	$.890	$8.70	$7.30
1857	1.853	.741	7.70	9.70
1858	1.015	.691	8.60	8.90
1859	.799	.769	7.10	8.20
1860	.981	.726	6.80	7.60
1861	1.234	.655	10.00	8.20
Average	1.377	.735	8 20	8.40

UNDER HIGH TARIFF.

	WHEAT.	CORN.	BEEF.	PORK.
1874	.27 5	$.692	$7.32	$7.32
1875	.877	.736	7.36	8.69
1876	1.109	.600	7.85	7.64
1877	1.092	.548	7.00	8.50
1878	1.318	.562	7.00	6.80
1879	1.067	.471	6.30	5.70
1880	1.243	.543	6.40	6.20
Average	1.156	.586	7.16	7.55
Difference	.161	.149	1.09	.85

Thus we see that the farmer's prices hav been actually less under high tariff, and this is not all. His living has cost him a great deal more on account of protection that he has not got and that does the farmer no good. His outdoor expenses hav also been greatly increased, thus rendering the farmers, especially in the younger states where capital is not so plenty as it is in older states, unable to develop their farms as fast as they could if living and implements were not from twenty to ninety per cent higher than they should be. MR. HIRT.

There are certain limits to everything, and when these are overstepped, even a good thing, or cause, becomes a curse rather than a blessing. So it is with our tariff system. A reasonable tariff is at present absolutely needed. We could not well get along without it. But for a number of years it has been carried beyond extremes to such an extent that it has created, on one side, some haughty, tyrannizing monopolists, and on the other, we may well say, a lot of poor, wretched, and miserable beggars and slaves.

Ingersoll says, "We find by actual experiment that it is better to protect home industries." That is very true. But he has forgotten to say that our farmers, too, need protection from being overcharged for the articles they buy from these protected home industries. If protection is merely given to one party and not to another, the "Great Ingersoll" will hav yet more to learn by "actual experiment," and that the farmer, too, is an "American laborer." And again, "It was once said that protection created nothing but monopoly; the argument was that way, but the facts were not." Protection gave into the hands of the protected the power to monopolize the prices for the articles they hav to sell. They took advantage of the occasion; hence, I cannot see how the colonel can infer that the facts are contrary.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 15th, S. Stebbins has given us an able argument representing New England's side of the tariff question. But has he written one word favoring the prosperity and welfare of that broad expanse of territory, the West? No, sir; not one. If the honorable gentleman has been only "more amused than instructed" by your reply to your Kansas correspondent concerning this question with regard to the American farmer, let him come West; and then he can, perhaps, by experience, and by aid of an unprejudiced eye, become more instructed than amused. Let him invest in plows, seeders, reapers, threshing-machines; in fact, a complete outfit of farming implements, which he buys from his Eastern protected monopolists at twice or thrice the actual cost to manufacture them; let him clothe himself and family with the present high-priced articles of wear and tear; and, when comes autumn, let him sell his few hard-earned bushels of grain at the trifling price his Eastern purchasers (also speculating monopolists) are willing to giv him; and if, then, he views the balance of his accounts, he will not be heard so loud and so far exclaiming, "Blessed be the tariff, and palsied the hand that would tear it down, or impair its efficacy."

He says, "What the farmer most needs is a good, steady, and reliable market for all he has to sell." True, but hav the Western farmers got this? No, sir. Their wheat is now being sold for seventy cents per bushel, and less in many places; while it actually costs upwards of a dollar per bushel to raise and market it. Potatoes are sold in all our small towns for twenty cents per bushel. Corn would be no more had it been a good crop; as it is, it brings us almost nothing. The same may be said of all other produce. But for a threshing-machine, which, perhaps, costs no more than one hundred dollars to manufacture, we must pay upward of six hundred dollars; for a reaper from two to three hundred dollars, which should sell for fifty; and so on for every other article down to the pocket-knife.

Your farmers, counting less than seventeen per cent of the whole population of your states, may well boast of selling all their produce—"veal, lamb, chickens, eggs, fresh brook, river, and lake fish, fresh ripe fruit of all kinds, fresh vegetables and flowers, to say nothing of the millions of cans of fresh milk consumed in our cities." But what becomes of our produce? Our veal, lamb, chickens, eggs, etc., are not bought by your manufacturing establishments; for our fresh ripe fruit you giv us no market; our flowers are born to blush unseen, and waste their sweetness on the desert air; while our billions of cans of fresh milk must be made use of as best we can, yielding but a small profit. But for every article we must buy of you, because most of our states are yet young and hav not the necessary manufactering industries, you charge us a double price. As for yourselvs, I think you understand your interest somewhat very well. But let me assure you that, at least in this matter, the East has not treated the West as a brother.

Our friend also says, "In looking around, the farmer here sees that nearly everything he needs is made by his home customers neater, better, and cheaper than the imported article." That is true enough. Let me tell him why so. The tariff imposed on articles imported is so high that your home customers can afford to sell perhaps ten or fifteen per cent cheaper without any inconvenience to themselvs, and at the same time realize a good profit therefrom. This argument is old here in the West, but doubtless our friend, living in a hotbed of protectionists, has not heard of it, or ignores it. Whatever of benefit the East may hav realized from our protectiv system, the West has not yet reaped any, and doubtless, under present circumstances, never will.

If the protectiv system is beneficial to a small tract of country, and injurious to one many times as large, with perhaps a greater per cent of its population devoted to agricultural pursuits, there can be no justice in enforcing such a system, which creates a few Vanderbilts, Astors, etc., in a few small states, to tyrannize over millions of slaves in the larger ones.

And, moreover, if our throats must be cut with a knife, what material difference if that knife be brought over from Sheffield, England, or from our near New England neighbors? Is not the West being filled up with the children of the East—your own sons and daughters? And are you willing in order to now gain ten or fifteen per cent profit yourself, to enforce upon your own children fetters by which they will lose hundreds per cent hereafter?

Is the West of no more importance than that it should lie supinely upon its back, and let the East place its heel upon the former's neck, and crush it beneath its power? Did you admit us into the Union to be made your football? Do the so-oft-chanted eulogiums on the prosperous condition of the working class, even of the East, harmonize with John Swinton's articles? Would they continually be on the strike if they were not actually driven to it?

And now, to conclude, let me warn you if you wish to retain our Union—that Union as dear to us as it ever dare be to any of you—and if you wish to retain the West as a trading-point, then, sir, giv us at least an equal chance with yourselvs. Giv us free trade when you hav it, and protection when you are protected JOHN H. HIRT.

Orthodoxy.

"Let me say, then, even at the risk of the most crushing self-condemnation, that I know not of any ghastlier irony than the life of a man who is orthodox in intellect and heterodox in heart. That is the deadly schism which rends the body of Christ. Think of a man boasting of his orthodoxy as to the mysterious constitution of the Godhead, and yet serving the devil in secret sin. [Cheers.] Think of a man callously sending others to the blackness of darkness on account of theological heresy, and yet cherishing malice and uncharitableness in the secret thoughts of his heart. Think of a man insisting upon the plenary inspiration of the scriptures, and yet being a churl at home, wanting in sympathy, querulous, exacting, and oppressiv. Men hav been expelled from the church for heresy, for drunkenness, for adultery, for theft; but who has ever been expelled for pride, for hardness of heart, for worldliness of mind, for bitterness of spirit, for self-righteousness, for contempt of the poor, or for censoriousness of speech? In escaping the vulgarity of crime we may hav yielded ourselvs to the refinement of sin. We must not forget that more is said in the Bible against pride than against drunkenness, and against an unforgiving spirit than against intellectual heresy, and we must caution ourselvs against the subtle danger of escaping those appeals under the lying pretense that they are commonplaces of Christian education."

Can the grim old fortress of orthodox faith long continue to withstand the many assaults to which it is now subjected? Can its defenders resist the fervid and eloquent appeals of Ingersoll; the able and indomitable attacks of the Liberal press; the flank movements of the Spiritualists, the Nonconformists, the Unitarians, and the Universalists; the undermining, disintegrating, and remorseless tests of science, and the indifference, disgust, if not open treason, of its ablest soldiers and defenders? PETER ECKLER.

"Good Homer Sometimes Nods."

Our brilliant casuist, T. B. Wakeman, in Man, not content with his generous triumph in revealing to poor Mgr. Capel the religion of Humanity, now as ungenerously knocks their antiquity out of the Hebrew traditions. Poor fellows! Herodotus forgets to write about them. They hav no historians but their own, which amount to none at all, because compilers hav chosen to stick the name of Moses before a book in which his death and burial are mentioned; and before the art of printing, how much Ezra may hav added to old manuscripts, nobody can tell. It is probably the political success ascribed to the book of Mormon which has suggested the idea that traditional religions and histories, such as those of Jesus and Moses, hav been but romantic compositons of theurgic novelists. Very different is the verdict of conscientious archæology. The old ships of theology are encrusted with barnacles and unseaworthy; but not rococo manufactured on purpose to cheat antiquarians. Invalidate the force of ancient prejudice by modern reason; kill superstition with the poison of science; let the spirit of nature preside in her temple of the world, no longer bedraggled with divine hypotheses; but don't begrudge the Jews the age of their old clothes.

Perhaps you will say it is a "fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind." Why not? Better be so kind than unkind. I am a Hebrew, to be sure, after the fashion of Heinrich Heine, which is, perhaps, like being a priest after the order of Melchizedek, my grandfathers' friend.

I suppose somebody had to be born so, and I just took the chances. I don't remember even having been consulted on the matter, and I could not very well hav voted on it through my representativ, as the ballot is a privilege from which, as well as Godfrey's cordial and the Comstock expurgate edition of morality, the majority of babes still unborn are excluded. I suggest the addition of a plank for them to the woman's rights platform. EDGEWORTH.

The Mummery of Mohammedanism.

From the Independent.

Nearly one-third of the human race hold the fierce faith of Arabia, praying five times with face toward Mecca to-day, and all the days; and this night, in the streets of Stamboul, when the watchman cries, "Who goes?" he hears from the Mohammedan, along with his answer, "There is no God but God." Well is the Moslem named the Faithful. In the sacred month of Ramazan, from sunrise to sunset, no true believer touches food or water. It is the holy month of Predestination, kept in memory of the revelation of the Koran, by the archangel Israfel, the word of the uncreated God which descended in leaves from heaven, verse by verse, to his prophet. When the weary thirty days of self-denial are ended comes the grand fête of Bairam—three days of feasting and revel. At night the six thousand lamps of St. Sophia are kindled, the many minarets are ringed with lights, showing in the darkness like glittering crowns let down from heaven. Texts from the Koran burst in illumination from slender tower to tower; the mosques, rounded domes and taper spires are festooned with ropes of lamps; the Bosphorus reflects trembling ribbons of flame from the palaces on its shores; and blazing globes on high flaunt in the face of the stars, seeming close under the sky; the guns of the forts thunder; echo answering echo from the girdling towers of the city of many fames, and Olympus, "high and hoar," watches the scene which poet has never sung and artist can never picture.

And yet, compared with its ancient splendors, Constantinople is but the reflected ray from a fading sunset. Once the fitful winds of the Marmora brought gems, spices, myrrh, balsam of furthest India. Ivory, gold-dust, silks, carpets, perfumes, came by caravan from Persia and Arabia. Every luxury poured into the lap of the most voluptuous of cities, which disputed with Rome pre-eminence of riches and numbers.

It had been swept by tempests of armies before it fell under the scimetar of the Turk. The conquerors of the world all came this way—Persian, Macedonian, Carthagenian, Roman, Genoese, Venetian; and the walls which circled Byzantium like a regal diadem were gashed and scarred by catapult and battering-ram ages before gunpowder was dreamed of. We can see the breach over which the last of the Constantines looked out, and, foreseeing his destiny, asked forgivness of his friends, serenely put off the imperial purple, that no man might recognize his corpse, and fearlessly went forth to meet the coming doom. SUSAN E. WALLACE.

Col. Kelso's New Book.

THE BIBLE ANALYZED. By John R. Kelso, A.M. Published by the Truth Seeker Co. Price $3.

This is a great book. Mr. Kelso is a powerful reasoner, and the reader of this volume, whoever he may be, must admit the force and truth of his conclusions. He is original, and states facts in that straightforward and impressiv manner that carries conviction with it. We all know there are errors in the Bible, and Mr. Kelso has pointed them out in a brave, fearless manner, and makes of his book a Liberal gem. It is a timely and valuable offering to Freethought literature, and no one can afford to be without it, for it is all its name implies—a full and complete analysis of the Bible, dissecting it thoroughly, from Genesis to Revelation. It is printed handsomely, and covers 833 pages. It has also a fine portrait of the author, whose bright face and broad brow indicate just the vigorous intellect that is impressed on every page. Col. Kelso is a disabled soldier, and labors under many disadvantages. He is entitled to all honor for his efforts to emancipate humanity from the bondage of superstition, and should receive encouragement to persevere in his useful labors. We prophesy a ready sale for this latest work, and trust that this and his former publications may place him and those dependent upon him above want. SUSAN H. WIXON

Editorial Notes.

THE enormous personal popularity of Colonel Ingersoll was never better shown than at Chicago. The Republican convention had adjourned early in the day to allow the delegates time to strengthen their slates and the committees to patch up their resolutions, when some one espied the colonel in the galleries amd shouted for a speech from him. The delegates and people who packed the immense hall paused in their outward movement, and men gathered around Ingersoll and tried to pull him from his seat amid vociferous cheers. The colonel declined, and "Uncle Dick" Oglesby got up and spoke an hour. At the conclusion of his remarks, in which he asserted that "when the Republican party had occasion to legislate on the tariff, it would do it in a perpendicular way, as it had never done anything of any kind horizontally, and it had never approached anything horizontally, and had never consummated anything horizontally," the crowd again demanded Ingersoll, and tried to drag him out. Again unsuccessful, Frederick Douglas was called for, who spoke a few minutes and sat down. For the third time shouts for Ingersoll echoed and re-echoed through the hall, but like the two previous calls were unavailing. The colonel wasn't nominating candidates this year to hav them refuse him recognition after election.

MGR. CAPEL has written a book to convert the Protestants. He tells them that the Catholic is the only divine church; that the tendency of the times is toward high churchism and Infidelity; that the established church of England is a hybrid Catholic without sanction of divine grace; intimates that none of the other Protestant churches are worth mentioning, notwithstanding the efforts of the leaders to set themselvs up as small popes; says it is better to be subject to one acknowledged spiritual despot than to many self-constituted ones; remarks that the stigmatizing by Protestants of the Catholic church as foreign is insolent and unwarranted, as Catholicism came to this country with Columbus; and after a defense of the word "Roman" addresses his brethren thus: "The tide of indifference, of Agnosticism, of Infidelity, of Socialism, of civil disorder, is rapidly rising. God's church can alone stem it. Numbers and influence and wealth co-operating with the spouse of Christ can help to do great things to aid in saving humanity from the growing ills. She is the church of your baptism, to whom you owe allegiance and obedience, for the saving waters of regeneration are the portal to but one church. They made you not members of Protestantism, but children of the church of God."

THE Federal council of the canton of Berne, Switzerland, has refused the petition of the Roman Catholics for the admission of the Roman orders to the public schools. "This is right," says the Rev. Jeems Buckley, D.D. "To allow religious teachers in the uniform of their sect in the public schools is illogical, and would in the end be destructiv of all forms of state education." It makes a good deal of difference to the Rev. Jeems whose ax is ground. He would put the Catholics out of the schools, but keep the Protestants in. The "uniform" of a Protestant is a long face and a Bible, and he can do as much harm in a public school as a Catholic in gown and cap. There is no logic nor sense in Buckley's position. Either Christianity is of that supreme importance demanding its precedence of all else, or it is of no account whatever in the schools. The middle ground occupied by the devotees of the German monk is a quagmire of inconsistency.

T. B. WAKEMAN is out in a rousing editorial in Man for "glorious old Ben Butler." Would not our honored friend do better to learn first how Mr. Butler stands on the question of state secularization? When governor of Massachusetts his proclamations were more religious than the average sermon, and we havn't seen in any of the platforms on which Mr. Butler is nominated the least reference to the principles of the secular party. Mr. Wakeman has several times hitched on to the "reform" political parties, thinking he saw in them a way to help Freethought, but every time his hopes hav proved delusiv. The Labor party, the Greenback party, the Anti-monopoly party, are all afraid to embody the demands of the League in their platforms, and hav not heard Mr. Wakeman's cry to giv him a tow. Self-respect would seem to demand a different course. It may be that Mr. Butler is friendly to our cause, but we propose to find that fact out before throwing up our hats for him.

THAT the fools are not all dead yet is evidenced by the case of the man who refused to send for a surgeon to set the broken arm of his child, relying on the faith cure to get the bones back into place. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, however, got hold of the case, and two surgeons were called in, who found that although nature had begun the reparativ process, the rotary motion of the arm was destroyed. It is a great pity that the justice before whom the father was brought discharged him with no punishment. Such inhuman conduct ought to be expiated in lonesome silence. But probably the justice was a Christian himself.

AN insane baker at Paterson, N. J., went around and solemnly warned his customers not to eat any of the bread they had bought that day. As some of them had already eaten it, they began to be seized with nausea and cramp, and sent for doctors. The bread was all right. The trouble was that they believed the insane man. It seems that faith is more potent to make men sick than to make them well.

A CORRESPONDENT recently called attention to the fact that church and circus were originally identical in meaning. Any one visiting the Rev. Mr. Talmage's Tabernacle might observe that history repeats itself.

Lectures and Meetings.

CHAINEY AND WALT WHITMAN.—Let every Liberal in New York and vicinity come next Sunday and hear George Chainey's great lecture on Walt Witman, the most original poet in America. No one has interpreted the life and greatness of this new world with such vigorous music as Whitman. He is in the world of poetry what Wagner is in the world of melody, and no one has more fully grasped the meaning of this virile bard than George Chainey. As dealing with a representativ poet, Mr. Chainey's lecture will also deal with the great aspects of American life, with the notable reforms of the day, which are demanded not simply by science, but by the spirit of art. His discourse will voice the most advanced and splendid Liberalism of the day. This will be the closing lecture of the course, which has been exceedingly valuable in the impulse which it has communicated to the Liberal thought of the city. Let there be a full house, and a generous response to our eloquent speaker. The lecture is at the German Masonic Temple, 220 East Fifteenth street, 11 o'clock Sunday morning. Admission free. Please advertise this among all friends of the Liberal cause.

THE Pittsburgh Liberal League will hav a Basket Picnic on Wednesday, the 25th. Aliquippa Grove is the place selected, and round trip tickets from Pittsburgh are sold at 50 cents; from Beaver Falls, 30 cents. Trains leave L. E. railroad at 7:45 and 8:30 A.M.; 12:50 and 3:40 P.M. Music by Staley's band. Admission by invitation.

The Colonel's Opinion of the Republican Nomination.

Robert G. Ingersoll was seen at the Hoffman House by a Mail and Express reporter, fresh from the Chicago convention, where he had been to witness the proceedings which resulted in the nomination of the "Plumed Knight."

"What do you think of the result of the convention?" he was asked.

"I think that Blaine was nominated," he replied, "not by the politicians, but by the rank and file of the party. He is the choice of, I think, nine-tenths of the Republicans of the Western states, and I do not believe there is a Republican district in the United States in which a majority of the Republicans are not and were not for Blaine. If any mistake has been made it has been a mistake of the party. The result was not brought about by any trading or trafficking. Blaine was nominated because the Republicans are for him. The fact is, it was impossible to beat him at Chicago."

"Is there not much opposition to him now?"

"I think there is not as much as there was in the case of Garfield after his nomination."

"How do you compare him with Garfield in respect to fitness for the office?"

"I think he will make a better president. I think he has more executiv ability. Blaine is regarded as a real American, as the representativ of the progressiv spirit of the country. He has a great hold upon the young men."

"What kind of administration will he giv us?"

"There is a general feeling that he would add to our national reputation and to our national importance; that he would protect our citizens abroad; that he would enlarge our trade and lay the foundation for a great and growing commerce."

"Some of his opponents claim that he is not a safe man, and point to his South American policy as an evidence. What do you think on that point?"

"Stupidity never has much confidence in brilliant men. The man who has quick perception and acts is apt to stun the ordinary man, and the ordinary man gets his revenge by calling him unsafe. I never could see any objection to Blaine's South American policy. It is certainly of greater importance that we should be friendly with all the republics on this continent, and I don't see how any harm could grow out of a closer alliance with those countries. It is certainly not for the interest of this country to hav all the other republics hate us and do all their trading with other countries. If I understand Blaine's policy at all, it was one of friendship—that is to say, he desired to be on good terms with our neighbors. When that policy is understood I think it will be popular."

"What of the connection of his name with the so-called Landreau claim?"

"Blaine has explained that. He never was in favor of that claim. There was this vital objection to the claim, and Blaine understood that perfectly: a citizen of another country had a contract with Peru. Peru violated the contract with the citizen of another country, and assigned his violated contract to the citizen of the United States. Under such circumstances the United States was not and could be bound to protect the claim. This country does not propose to protect one of its citizens to whom has been assigned the grievances of the citizens of another country. In other words, national protection is not assignable. Blaine knew of that vital defect, and called attention to it, and that ended the case."

"What can be said in reference to the Mulligan case?"

"That has all been explained by Blaine in Congress. You will remember his explanation, commencing with the statement that he proposed to take fifty millions of people into his confidence. There is nothing left of the Mulligan matter."

"Do you consider his record perfect and unassailable?"

"I do not. Any man's record may be assailed, no matter how good, but I don't believe that Blaine can be successfully assailed. In other words, nothing can be substantiated against him. Garfield, too, was attacked, and probably there never was a greater storm of vituperation, and yet I doubt very much if Garfield lost a vote. There was certainly more said against Garfield than against Blaine. Besides, all this has been discounted long ago."

"Do you think the Democrats will be able to nominate any man at all who will be able to defeat him?"

"I think not. A great many men now imagin that they will go against Blaine. They are now making the choice in their minds between Blaine and some other Republican whom they wanted nominated. In a little while they will be forced to choose between Blaine and a Democrat, that is to say between Republicanism and Democracy—that is to say, between Free Trade and Protection—that is to say, between an English and an American policy. When it comes to that most of them will vote for Blaine. I think most of the Republican papers that hav pronounced against Blaine will find that they hav made a mistake and will be candid enough to correct it."

"Do you include the New York Times in that category?"

"Yes. I think the Times prefers a Republican administration to a Democratic one."

"You consider, then, that the Republican party is by no means dead?"

"I think it will win this time. There is a good deal of vigor in the Republican party yet, and those who hav been fighting that ticket for many years, after all, no matter how much they may object to our candidate, will hesitate a good while before they will assist to put the Democrats into power. I never want to see the Democratic party in charge of the government until the Democrats hav become civilized to such a degree that the rights of all citizens of the United States will be respected and protected. I never want to see that party in power until it is willing that every citizen entitled to a vote shall vote, and until it is honest enough to count the votes deposited by all citizens. This, I think, is the feeling of all Republicans."

"You consider the prospects for success in November, then, quite bright?"

"I think the outlook is better than it was four years ago. Blaine, of course, will make a very vigorous canvass. He will hav his forces well in hand and everything will be done that can be, and the canvass will be thorough, aggressiv, and enthusiastic. I don't mean by that obnoxiously aggressiv or maliciously aggressiv. It will be carried on in the best spirit."

"How does Logan's nomination suit you?"

"I think he is exceedingly strong with the soldier element of the party. He is a good soldier, won great distinction and stands deservedly high with the volunteers; and he is a good organizer himself, and his record, so far as I know, is perfectly good. I hav never heard of any charge of dishonesty against him, or that his official position has been used to gain personal ends. I think there is no man in the Senate with a cleaner record in that regard. In the event of a vacancy in the presidental chair he would make a safe man. All his impulses are patriotic and he is a man of ability. He is a man of strong common sense and great force of character. The country would be perfectly safe in his hands."

"Hav you any doubts of the success of the Republicans in the coming campaign?"

"Of course. Nothing is certain, but my judgment is that we will succeed. It will require work and plenty of it. I don't think it wise to underrate the strength of the opposition. The parties are very evenly divided, and we must remember another thing—that the South is solid, or substantially so. This givs the Democrats a great advantage. Some enthusiastic Republicans expect to carry West Virginia, and others are enthusiastic enough to suppose that we can carry two or three Southern states. I make no such calculations. I think we can succeed without carrying a Southern state."

"Can Blaine carry New York state?"

"Garfield carried it. No one can tell how it is going to go now. There are many new voters, new questions, and new influences on both sides. I believe Blaine will carry the strength of the party. If he loses some Republicans he will gain votes that might not hav been Republican with any other candidate, so that on the whole we hav very good reason to hope that we will carry New York against anybody the Democrats may nominate. As the canvass proceeds many men now opposed to the ticket will come over to our side. I can hardly see how any one who took part in the convention can oppose the ticket. If Edmunds had been nominated certainly George William Curtis would hav expected every delegate to hav supported him, and why should he go into a convention and take part in the election of the candidate if he didn't expect to abide by the result? Why should anybody? Had I been a delegate I would hav supported the nominee, no matter if he had been my bitterest personal opponent. If any delegate to the convention did not expect to abide by the result in case a certain man was nominated, he should hav notified the convention."

The Infidel's Prayer.

Giv me a God who, though mighty,
Is ever a God who is kind.
Show me the God that made me
With a weak and wavering mind;
Then tell me that he doth hate me
For the work or his own great hand,
And will damn me for my shortcomings,
And faults that I never planned
Show me the God whose sole purpose—
Yet having omnipotent power—
Will crush in its earthly strivings
A delicate human flower;
I'll call such a God a tyrant,
A hater of things he hath made,
A cruel, insensate vandal,
Whose home is a mansion of shade.
Show me a God who is gentle,
Show me a God who is just,
Show me a God in whom mankind
Can repose an infinit trust;
Then I'll show you a man who is godlike,
Since he came from the hand of a God,
Who rules by his mercy and wisdom,
Ignoring the chastening rod! W. CARLETON.

"One World at a Time."

This is the cry set up by those who are opposed to the investigation of the claims of modern Spiritualism, by some professed reformers who hav learned, as it would appear from the attitude they assume, all there is to know in this universe of ours. Speak to one of these of phenomena that are taking place in your own home or that of your friends, and it is met by this—it may be scientific, I know it is senseless—cry of "One world at a time." Now these phenomena in this world are a part of the affairs of this world, and, it would appear from their persistence against all the opposition of theological and scientific bigots, they hav come to stay. They are among the persistent forces of the universe, and will not down at the bidding of any one.

The believers in Spiritualism are counted by millions, and are to be found in every civilized country in the world. It has encompassed the globe without missionaries, without authoritativ leaderships, and without any sacred books. All of these believers hav been compelled, by evidence that has come to them, to renounce their previously conceived opinions and accept what was proven to them. Every one of them has demanded and received what to him or her was conclusiv evidence of the fact of individual existence after the death of the body, and of the power under certain conditions to communicate with those still clothed in mortal form. I hav never yet seen the person who had a belief in Spiritualism based upon what some one else had seen or experienced. In this it is distinctiv, and unlike every form of past religions. It has no creed, is unorganized, and simply affirms and claims to be able to demonstrate that the death of the physical body does not kill a man; that he has a continued conscious, individual existence, and the same characteristics as here; that the law of progress is eternal, and that the formation of a physical man is not the finis of evolution.

Among those who hav carefully and critically examined these phenomena only to be convinced they were what they claimed to be, are to be found the names of a few eminent scientists in both this country and the Old World, who were brave enough and honest enough to engage in an unpopular investigation, expecting, however, to be able to demonstrate that the causes were other than those claimed.

Professor Hare, of Philadelphia, a man of rare erudition and skill, undertook to thus explain the physical phenomena, and after conducting a most thorough investigation in his own laboratory, with the most critical tests that science could invent and apply, was compelled, against his expectation, to decide in favor of its claims, and he wrote a book, "Spiritualism Scientifically Explained," in which he givs the modus operandi of his investigations, and the results. I would reccommend those scientific gentlemen who know all about it without any thorough investigation to read this work, also Zoellner's "Transcendental Physics," and Epes Sargent's "Planchette; or, The Despair of Science," carefully, and they will know more than at present upon this subject. Professors Crookes, Wallace, Mapes, and others hav come to similar conclusions.

Judge Edmonds, one of our soundest jurists, one accustomed to weigh evidence carefully and examin testimony critically, after a most thorough and careful investigation came to the same conclusion, and published a book on the subject.

I might go on and cite hundreds who stand high in popular esteem as learned, wise, and good men, who, in spite of their desire to the contrary, and in spite of the opprobrium attached to such belief by ignorant theologians and scientists, hav been, by their nativ honesty, compelled to acknowledge that a power outside of the physical body manifested intelligence and further gave proof unmistakable of identity, as persons who had lived among us, but were what we call dead, and that they still continue to liv as individuals. The great mass of professed scientists, instead of investigating these phenomena with the honest, fearless purpose which should characterize all efforts to understand and explain any phenomena of nature, which certainly it is the province of science to do, decide the case a priori upon the apparent hypothesis that there is nothing in the universe that has not been discovered and explained, and that their established ideas must be maintained at all hazards; they, like the pope, are infallible. Instead of investigating these phenomena, which all must admit exist, with an honest purpose, to learn what may be the cause, with the spirit of humility that all true scientists and large-brained, broad-souled men possess, they go into an examination, if at all, prejudging the case, and with a feeling of condescension on their part; or, like T. B. Wakeman in Man, who declares, "The investigator of Spiritualism has need to be more cute than a lynx, more heartless than marble, more cruel than a vivisector, and more impolite than a hyena." This shows as much intolerance and injustice as does Talmage or any other theological "crank," and is an insult to hundreds of men and women, in this and other countries, of attainments in science, and understanding "the law of the correlation of forces" of which he prates so frequently. He claims to be able to explain, but never does, all these phenomena. Were I a spirit, capable of returning and manifesting myself to my friends, I know the prospect of such a reception of heartlessness, frigidity, cruelty and impoliteness would be amply sufficient to cause me to leave all such to their satisfied ignorance.

It is well for a man who does not know a thing to honestly admit it; but it is the hight of arrogance and folly to assume no one else does. Ingersoll's simple admission, "I don't know," is more becoming, or, as Burnham says, "I don't know whether we liv hereafter or not; I hope we do. I think we ought to."

Elmina Slenker writes to T. B. Wakeman in Man, "We must go deeper than this, and prove that death ends all, or turn around and help on the other side—help prove that we still liv—and then seek for the best mode of obtaining the truest and most useful information from the beyond."

That is sensible, and the only position an intelligent unbeliever in Spiritualism can occupy, except that of agnosticism in the matter; but I fear it would be harder to prove that death ends all than it is to prove the reverse, for where could we find our witnesses? But were we to ask some of our wise opponents, Can you prove it? they would doubtless reply, "Yes; in the law of the correlation of forces." A wise reply leaving one so thoroughly posted on the subject!

It is amusing only for its being sad to see some of these people who hav decided the question twenty-five or thirty years ago declaring the evidence all in, keep on the even tenor of their ways, no matter if you pile testimony mountains high before them. They gently glide around it and resume the same old strain, thus illustrating another scientific law, that bodies move in the line of the least resistance, a law as universal in its application as that of "the correlation of forces." This method is illustrated by one of our oldest papers, and a good one too, that is always reiterating the same reply to any testimony that may be adduced to the contrary. The writer will proceed to relate what he has seen in clairvoyance, for instance, of the most remarkable character; his statements strengthened by corroborativ testimony until one would think the evidence must convince the most obdurate, but after all the same polite, gentle, but decisiv reply is forthcoming: It can not be true, because there is no such thing as clairvoyance. If there is, why do not the mediums tell where Charlie Ross is? That is conclusiv. No matter how much more wonderful the facts stated may hav been, they did not tell where Charlie Ross was, or the murderer of some recent victim.

To persons posted on such subjects, such talk is much like a blind man's declaring there is no such thing as light, or a deaf man that no sound is produced by striking the keys of a piano. It simply shows that to spiritual things they are blind and deaf.

I like honest skepticism, am very skeptical myself, but I claim honest skepticism will believe one thing as quickly as another on the same amount of evidence; that an honest, intelligent skeptic does not care what he believes, so it be the truth. He is willing to kneel at the shrine of Mother Nature, listen reverently to every voice to be heard, to feel every pulsing throb of her great heart, and try and interpret all the voices and pulsings intelligently—as a wise physician notes the beating of the human pulse, and from its indications forms certain conclusions, instead of deciding what the disease is in advance, and then interpreting the symptons in harmony with his decision—knowing that whatever changes of opinion he may be compelled to entertain in the interest of truth will be for the advancement of the human race, and his own growth and happiness. And no one is competent to investigate any subject properly until that spirit is attained. Would not that be a better qualification than to be "more cute than a lynx, more heartless than marble, more cruel than a vivisector, and more impolite than a hyena?"

But is this spirit of impartial investigation manifested by the opponents of Spiritualism in the Liberal ranks, where it certainly ought to be? Let's see. "Bottom Facts" is often referred to by these scientific editors as evidence, and I certainly think the author possessed all the qualifications required as an investigator in the aforementioned remarkable requisition. In courts of justice, if I am not mistaken, if a witness is proven to hav given false testimony, his evidence is thrown out or impeached, if he is not sent to prison for perjury.

Now these wise ones, who will smile with incredulity or derision at the testimony of hundreds and thousands of intelligent, honest, upright citizens, whose words on any other subject would never be doubted, offer in rebuttal this book, the work of a self-confessed fraud, and who, according to his own admissions, has for years deceived in the most sacred things of the human heart.

A person who would deliberately resort to mean and contemptible measures, I care not for what purpose, seems to me to be capable of anything in the way of crime. The question I should think would naturally arise in relation to any of his present statements, as put by my venerable Quaker friend, "Did thee lie then, or does thee lie now?" Consistency is not a scientific attainment, I presume.

The one world at a time theory must hav been the popular one when the Bible history of creation was written, this being the only world, and all the others since proven to hav existence would still remain as only lights and ornaments to this, had the "one world at a time" theory prevailed. It is the ignorant cry of the primitiv integration, and does not belong to the present age, and it is because there were spirits brave enough and wise enough to investigate other worlds and suffer contumely, scorn, and even death itself in consequence from persons living then who thought they knew it all, as some seem to now, that we know anything of astronomy with its mighty revelations.

A few years ago, had some person with clairvoyant vision told of the wonderful world then unseen and unknown lying all around and about us that the microscope has revealed to man, he would hav been considered as idiotic or insane, as are those who now tell of the no more wonderful world of spirit existence that surrounds us, that some day some invention of man may be able to reveal to the external senses of the most spiritually obtuse. Science constantly compels us to believe facts quite as wonderful as any revelation that claims to come from the beyond. I indorse the words of M. J. Savage in his Easter sermon in Boston. In speaking of Spiritualism he says: "As to science, I see no right that she has to turn her back on any fact. And since she is all the time dealing with invisible forces, the nature of which she cannot explain, it could be only arrogance that could lead her to disregard one of these because it seemed to be intelligent."

Milwaukee, Wis. JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M.D.

Are We Liberal?

Did a question of this nature emanate from those who conduct THE TRUTH SEEKER, its many readers would respond in the affirmativ. The generous use of its columns for the discussion of all cognate questions related to human rights and happiness makes it an indispensable necessity to every radical thinker, and in every home where reason and justice are encouraged and practiced.

While it is not a matter of surprise, it is a cause of sincere regret that so many of our Liberal friends exhibit such a spirit of bitterness and intolerance while engaged in opposing others, or elucidating their own opinions. This intolerance is in great part the legacy that Christianity, in its more orthodox phase, has entailed upon us, and which is so ingrained in the marrow of our mental and emotional characteristics that it seems well-nigh impossible to shake it off. As long as this superstitious incubus rests upon us, slow indeed will be the march of Liberal ideas. Discard as we may the importance of the emotional tendencies, and exalt as we desire the conclusion of enlightened reason, still it will remain true for many generations yet to come that the masses of mankind will be swayed most by appeals to the emotional side of their nature. However learned the teacher, howsoever his conclusions prove their advantage for human well-being, is he merely an intellectual giant, whose appeals simply satisfy the reason, he will fail. We hav to first touch the human heart; with love and tenderness we must show our nearness of kin to them by those influences that won the child and reached the soul of the mother. With this inspiration that lacks intolerance for opinion's sake, we hav within us the elements of true reform. I hold that this is one essential of true Liberalism. As yet the educational influences of "Freethought" hav not wrought out half their mission in connecting the old methods of intolerant abuse. Ere this we who constitute the school of radical thought and Liberal ideas should hav discovered the utter impossibility of honest minds reaching the same conclusion. No one at all cognizant of the earnestness with which men and women enlist in what to them seems important life-work, however much it may differ, can fail to giv credit to the workers, and commend their good intentions. The wordy war between Messrs. Putnam and Andrews was not as free as it should hav been from what bordered on the rancorous and bitter. Of course these giants hav their followers. Sister Elmina seems jubilant to think Mr. Putnam, in a few concise words, settles the whole question of the origin of mind and potentiality of matter. I am sure she is true and honest. Many will come to different conclusions, myself among the number. To me Mr. Putnam's conclusions hav not the odor of newness, and are only fresh in their prettiness of phraseology. In a different form they are but the bold statement of old-time Materialism. To many good, generous, and pure people they will seem conclusiv, and almost a divine revelation, clothed as they are in his poetic imagery. To another, and I think much larger class, Mr. Andrews will appear the victor.

The trouble with most of us consists in the fact that we forget the necessity for this difference of opinion, and while too often blaming others for where they stand to-day, fail to recollect our position yesterday. Look at the immense amount of wrangling between Spiritualists and Materialists, and see the intolerant flings at each other for opinion's sake. It is just as true as the sun shines that the present method of discussion will add no well-earned laurels to either side. We of the incorrigible Spiritual order are not a whit less conscious of spirit intercourse and continued life, and instead of finding fault with our Materialistic friends, we think they hav done us good service. We hav looked better to our evidences, hav detected more readily the spurious, and are more than ever conscious of the weakness and unfitness of Materialistic philosophy to satisfy the needs of human nature, and to account for phenomena beyond the reach and present methods of modern science.

Many pure and honest Materialists, like our dear old friend, D. R. Burt, who so recently passed out of the earthly form, are growing, as he grew, to be more tolerant to us, and as he wrote and said to me, "I don't know how it is, but the more I mingle with Spiritualists the better I like them." And in addition, "Perhaps the wish is father to the thought. I almost hope, Brother George, your opinions are correct." Now, this is not introduced as any evidence for our opinions, but simply to illustrate how largely he was a true Liberal. While conscious that Christian churchianity is crystallized intolerance and superstition, there is a certain per cent of minds who honestly adhere to Christianity that are largely liberal and tolerant. As among my friends and acquaintances a portion of this element is represented, I will not condemn all with that sweeping denunciation too many radicals indulge in.

Another illustration of bad blood crops out in the discussion of prohibition. This discussion has been allowed large latitude of time and space in THE TRUTH SEEKER. As I am personally acquainted with a number of the disputants, and hav an anxious desire to see the question thoroughly sifted, the discussion was followed closely. I was sorry to see Brother George Gage handled so roughly by Walker and Leland, the latter especially, for Brother Gage is not at all such a man as friend Tee Cee supposes him. He is a grand and noble, if a mistaken, man. I do not say he is mistaken. Then, again, they picture Walker as a horrid fellow, when he is nothing of the sort, and in this game of "teter tater," as we used to call it, he is only on the opposit side of the plank, taking his ride down when his opponent goes up, and up when they are down. In a late TRUTH SEEKER, a correspondent from Ohio, who signs his name "Wm. Paulucci," champions Walker's position, and pours hot shot at Brother Jamieson by kindly telling him he (Jamieson) is used up. Now, in this he is mistaken. Brother Jamieson is not used up. Even I hav told him he was angular, too combativ, attempted too much, and withal a little too ambitious, but did not think him used up. Brother Jamieson is a good worker. There is nerve, pluck, and vim in him to keep Brother Walker and others busy for a long time. Used up? not much! Then again this Ohioan never knew a prohibitionist that was not a close-fisted church-member. For one I am sorry to think his associations hav been so limited. I know honest prohibitionists of all shades of opinion—Materialists, Spiritualists, Catholic and Protestant Christians, and those who drink the infernal stuff to excess, and which latter class pray for it as their only means of salvation.

After reading all sides, I scarcely know where I stand. Practically, I prohibit, and I am not sure I would not vote to try the thing if opportunity offered. On general principles, the abuse of it (liquor) is so common that at times it seems an unmitigated curse. Experience with the large majority of those who use it, and contend against its prohibition as an infringement of personal liberty, hav no objection to the disenfranchisment of women; in fact, as a rule, they scorn the idea of women voting, while the majority of Prohibitionists are ready, willing, and anxious for woman's enfranchisment. My judgment, as yet, holds this question in abeyance, and yet there is no doubt on my part of the sincerity and honesty of the disputants on the different sides, who ventilate their opinions through the medium of THE TRUTH SEEKER. In the discussion of this and cognate questions, let us ask ourselvs, "Are we Liberal?" and let what we say and do be a correct solution, so that we show by our examples that our growth out of the Christian church system has made us nobler and better men and women.

GEORGE LYNN.

Comstock's Distinguished Relativs.

John Winthrop, Boston correspondent of the New York Independent, givs a little account of Comstock's speech there which was the same old one that we hav heard here ad nauseam, and then bolsters up the great vicegerent by the following bit of respectable relationship:

"It adds not a little to the practical bearing of such a man's life upon the youth of the land to know that this earnest man has a brother who resembles him in physique and features, who is an instructor at Philips Academy, Andover, the Rugby of our New England."

But Winthrop didn't tell of that other Comstock brother, in jail for stealing a watch.—Man.

Methods of Presenting Freethought.

Mr. Ringer, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of yesterday, sounds the right note in the suggestion he throws out concerning the coming Freethinkers' Convention at Cassadaga Lake. I hav often thought that the Radicals, in their grand enterprise of delivering the minds and consciences of their countrymen from the bondage of the church superstition, ought to study the methods adopted by the Abolitionists when they undertook the herculean task of revolutionizing the public sentiment on the subject of American slavery. Knowing that in a republic the people were the source of all authority and power, they began by organizing, first themselvs, and then their converts, into societies, as a sine qua non to any practical work. Christianity, although it had some friends in Cæsar's household, began its work of undermining the old paganism by operating on the masses of the people. The Abolitionists did so too. As the object was to enlighten the popular mind, they sent out into the villages of the country, the highways and the hedges, lecturers, generally two by two, who understood the whole subject of disciplin from beginning to end, and whose souls were thoroughly in their work. Wherever they could get an audience of a dozen persons they delivered their message. Earnest and sincere men, no matter what cause they advocate, will always, sooner or later, get a hearing. After arranging for a series of meetings, the speakers would lay down a plan of the campaign, and work into each other's hands by a consecutiv course of reasoning. For instance, A, in a speech of an hour, would define slavery, showing what was the legal status of a slave, and what the Abolitionists proposed to do. He would be followed by B, in a half-hour's address, driving home the facts and arguments of A, as a carpenter drives and clinches a nail. At the next meeting B would be the leading speaker, and would show the conservativ nature of liberty, and that the slave, the master, and the soil, would all be gainers if free labor were substituted for slave. Then A follows with an address confirmatory of B's position. By this time the audience became interested, and wished to know more on the subject. The speakers keep up this logical train of thought, appealing to the intelligence and conscience of their hearers; and when the last of the two days' sessions were closed, every man who came to hear, provided he had a head to understand, and a heart to feel, was, henceforth and forever, an Abolitionist.

There is a striking analogy between the conditions of this country forty years ago in regard to slavery, and its condition now in regard to that vast system of superstition entrenched in the Christian church. The whole nation is priest-ridden. By that I do not mean that all the people are members of the church, and believe her doctrins; but that the priest, finding the people saddled and bridled by the past, and ready and willing to be ridden, mounts and rides. He baptizes our children when they are born; marries our sons and daughters when they found new families; and officiates on all funeral occasions with his doleful platitudes. At the late Chicago convention, although not one man in a hundred had a spark of what is called religion, the priest must open the convention with the mockery of prayer. Priestcraft, with its mummeries, like the frogs of Egypt, is everywhere. Now, how are we to free the people from this bondage? How are we to unhorse the clergy so that the people need not go any longer on all fours? Why, in the very way which the Abolitionists adopted, first in teaching the people on the slavery subject, and then, when soundly converted, organizing them into societies for practical work. What we want is an ever-enlarging constituency of voters, who, when the time comes, can act in carrying out our measures of offense or defense. What makes an act of Congress omnipotent is the fact that it is a representativ body, and has a constituency of fifty odd millions of people. Why did not the bill for making Good Friday a religious fast day pass the lower house of the New York legislature? The Senate sanctioned this new encroachment of the church on the liberties of the people. What strengthened the back-bone, and stiffened the knee joints of Mr. Ruggles, state superintendent of public instruction for the state of New York, so that he put an end to the mockery of prayer, Bible reading, and hymn singing in the public schools of the state? I strongly suspect it was the knowledge that Green's Freethought conventions, which hav been held so frequently, hav a constituency of voters who will punish a politician if he truckles to the church.

I wish to avoid a religious war, which is sure to come, unless we enlighten the masses who vote and who are the source of all political power in the state. Hence, conventions ought to be made attractiv by having particular subjects discussed, and the programs, with the topics and speakers, all announced beforehand. Allow me to say that there is too much waste of talent at our conventions, for want of a specific purpose and a plan. One-third the speakers present, if they understood each other, would do more work, and better, than if all manner of subjects were discussed by a large number of people. The conferences at such meeting, where the people express their views in short speeches, are to me deeply interesting, because we can estimate the worth of the constituents. They are the light artillery in the army of Freethought, and do invaluable work in their respectiv neighborhoods by calling the attention of the people to the subject, and awakening in them a desire to know more, and in getting them to take our Freethought papers. The heavy artillery are the thinkers, speakers, and editors, who take the bullion of Freethought, hammer it out into shape, and coin it in the mint of their brains, and by speech and pen circulate it among the people. One of the standing topics of discussion for conferences, during the meetings, of a convention should be "the best method for enlightening the minds of the common people in regard to the issues we make with the church." The common people know more on this practical subject than our studious men who do not mix much with them, and who do not adopt their discourses to popular audiences. It is the crowning merit of Ingersoll, as it was of his illustrious predecessor, Thomas Paine, that he takes an abstract principle, which, in the handling of most other men, would put an audience to sleep, and dresses it up in such attractiv style that the common people comprehend and rapturously accept it. And it is the common people, not the uncommon people, that we are after. All of which is respectfully submitted by Vicious Literature.

There is a flood of humanity ever sweeping toward idiocy and insanity. Every day we read of the youth who has started westward after Indian scalps, and the man who has ended his life with the rope or dagger. Every paper that we pick up has in it an account of some insane wretch who has either murdered some of his family or committed suicide. Vicious literature is corrupting the human race. We are becoming mentally diseased by reading the fancies of others and believing them to be facts.

The boy who reads the tales of the West until he thinks they are real, and is inspired to be a desperado, is unfortunate; but the one that reads and believes a more ancient novel, which relates incredible incidents of war and bloodshed, not only of this world, but of other worlds in other spheres, is surely in a more deplorable condition. His imagination is always picturing celestial cities with diamond-paved streets and gates of pearl, inhabited by fairies which are half human and half bird. And in his dreams the poor maniac holds converse with these beaked and feathered vagrants of the skies, which exist only in his own fancy.

This novel, which givs accounts of battles between characters called angels, gods and devils, does more harm than all others together. It is taught to us from the cradle to the grave. No sooner has the child learned to talk than the parents begin teaching it to believe these fairy tales, and to ask favors of the boss fairy or god, and even to advise him how his affairs should be conducted.

This hero is not human like those we read about in the western tradition. He is a spirit—a three-bodied monster who made this universe of nothing, and then had as much nothing left as he had before; who once came down here and bore an illegitimate child to a married woman named Mary; who had a great opponent named Satan, and who first started the human race with Adam and Eve, and afterward drowned the world and started our race anew with a family called Noah. The child that Mary bore was named Jesus, and now it is said that Mary is not only his mother, but also his father's mother, making her Christ's grandmother. It is further claimed that Christ is God, his own father, the father of Mary, and consequently the father of his own grandmother, which makes him the great grandfather of himself.

In every town we hav houses where people spend a day in each week inoculating this fairy tale into the minds of their children. Freeman and Guiteau are specimens of children who were reared in this manner.

The hero of this novel was very fond of meat. He did not eat it as we do; but while his slaves roasted the carcasses of rams and bullocks, he reached his head out over the edge of a cloud and let his divine nostrils feast on the ascending fumes.

Incredible as it may appear, the majority of people in so-called civilized countries believe this vile superstition to be actually true. And countries that are not called civilized believe traditions which are equally absurd. Vicious literature has its baneful influence on the whole world.

These works of fiction hav filled the world with imbecils. Our asylums are full, and the only alternativ is to let them run at large. They build churches, preach what they call the "Gospel of Jesus Christ," and even edit newspapers. They would resist any attempt to pen them up, and if they could be all confined in an asylum, there would not be enough people left outside to carry food to the inmates. The disease commonly known as religion is epidemic, and the only medicin that will giv humanity relief is scientific education.

Two Open Letters.

We hav forwarded letters, of which the following are copies, to the Hon. James Gillespie Blaine, Republican candidate for president, and the Hon. Benjamin F. Butler, candidate of the Greenback, Labor Union, and Anti-Monopolist parties:

TO JAMES G. BLAINE.

HON. JAMES G. BLAINE, Augusta, Me., Dear Sir: When you were a member of the House of Representativs, in 1875, you introduced the following resolution:

"No state shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; and no money raised by taxation in any state for the support of public schools, or derived from any public fund therefor, nor any public lands devoted thereto, shall ever be under the control of any religious sect; and no money so raised or lands so devoted shall be divided among religious sects or denominations."

It met with little favor at the hands of your fellow-members, being killed by an absurd amendment originating in the Judiciary Committee. In the Senate you will doubtless recollect that Mr. Edmunds, one of your antagonists at the late Chicago convention, offered a constitutional amendment of a directly opposit character, which only failed by two of having the necessary two-thirds affirmativ votes. It was well for the country that he was defeated in the preliminary canvass for the presidency.

Our object in writing to you now is to ask these questions:

If elected president, will you, in your message to Congress, recommend a constitutional amendment similar in purport to the resolution introduced by you into the House? Will you also do all in your legitimate and legal power to prevent the payment from the national treasury of the salaries of chaplains in the army and navy? Your familiarity with our Constitution will enable you to perceive at a glance that the present course in this respect is an illegal procedure.

It is not probable that even the recommendation of the president would secure the passage of the amendment, but a beginning must be made, else this country will, in a few years, experience the dangerous evil of a united church and state. Millions of dollars are now annually donated by the various states and the national government to religious purposes. The only safe way, therefore, is to forever prohibit by constitutional amendment any state, and the national government, from loaning credit or giving money to any religious or anti-religious institution. We await your reply.

TO B. F. BUTLER.

TO THE HON. BENJ. F. BUTLER, Dear Sir: You are the candidate of the Greenbackers, Anti-Monopolists, and Labor Unions for the presidency. The sympathies of thousands of Freethinkers are with one or another of these parties. But with many, state secularization is paramount to all other considerations. No matter who is elected, this question presses forward for solution. Either our governmental institutions must be wholly Christian or wholly secular. The impossibility of maintaining them as they now are—secular in theory, Christian in practice and in law—must be apparent to you, a deep student of history.

We are well aware that while governor of Massachusetts your proclamations were almost pathetic in religious tone, but we beg to remind you that the world has never decided three things as to them: Whether the piety expressed came from an honest but mistaken heart; whether it was a bid for pious votes; or whether it was an exquisit satire and well-deserved rebuke to the pharisaical descendants of puritanical bigots.

For the benefit of several thousand Freethinkers, we beg to be enlightened. And we want to ask you a plain question: If you are elected, will you in your message to Congress recommend the following, or a similar, amendment to the United States Constitution?

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:
PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.
ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any state shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of church and state, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any state, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any state. No person shall ever in any state be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to giv evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever in any state be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any state, territory, municipality, or any civil division of any state or territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrins of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious practices shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall hav power to enforce the various provisions of this article by appropriate legislation.

Will you also do all in your legitimate and legal power to prevent the payment from the national treasury of the salaries of chaplains in the army and navy?

You are undoubtedly able to answer these questions at once, without argument, and we anxiously await your reply.

The object of the foregoing is to satisfy ourselvs as to the desirability of Mr. Blaine's or Mr. Butler's election. We do not propose to vote for any candidate who is not sound on the question of state secularization. A similar letter will be forwarded the Democratic candidate, and we hope every Freethinker in the country will write the three gentlemen.

The probabilities are, of course, that no answer will be returned. The churches are, as yet, too powerful for a popular candidate to affirmativly answer these questions. A negativ answer, the candidates know, will mean the loss of a few votes, and a discreet silence will be maintained.

A man who has not the courage of his opinions, one way or the other, is, however, too destitute of backbone to make a safe president. It is better not to vote at all than to vote for an enemy or a friend too cowardly to avow his friendship. If any candidate has doubts as to his position on these questions, we hav none as to him.

Army and Navy Chaplains.

One of the abuses imposed upon the tax-payers of the country by the Christian church is the support of chaplains for the army and navy, and in the two houses of Congress. Although Congress may make no law respecting the establishment of religion, according to the Constitution, it has done so in violation of that instrument. For many years the politicians hav paid but little attention to our national charter, and the Supreme Court in many of its decisions has shown as little regard.

The Army Register for this year shows the full number of chaplains allowed by act of Congress. Thirty post chaplains distribute spiritual food to a little over 28,000 enlisted men and officers, supplemented by four coffee-colored shouters for the colored regiments. The employment of these latter was authorized by act of Congress July 28, 1866. The others derive their license from an act passed as long ago as March 2, 1849. Their relativ rank is as captains of infantry, and considering ministerial predilections toward the sisters, it is, perhaps, about right.

These thirty-four incumbrances draw from the tax-payers of the country wages varying from $125 to $175 a month. The pay scale is for the first five years' service $125 per month; for the next five years, $137.50; after ten years' service, $150; after fifteen years, $162.50; after twenty years, $175. Upon retiring they are pensioned at the rate of $112.50 to $157.50 a month. There are at present thirteen of these retired leeches upon the roster. When traveling on orders chaplains draw in addition mileage of eight cents per mile.

The average drain upon the treasury for these unconstitutional burdens is probably about $1,800 a year each. Forty-seven times eighteen hundred dollars is eighty-four thousand six hundred dollars, a snug little sum to be spent annually to establish religion by our law-makers in defiance of their oaths to support the Constitution.

In the navy affairs are as bad. Chaplains while getting their sea legs on are paid $2,500 a year; after five years' service, $2,800. If during the initiatory five years they are left on shore to say their prayers, the people pay them $1,200 per year; after the five years, $2,300. On leave of absence, or waiting orders, doing nothing, they command $1,600 or $1,900, according as they hav been the five years or more in the navy. Retired chaplains hold the relativ rank of captains, with three-fourths pay. There are twenty-three of these naval nuisances activly engaged, with a round half dozen retired. A few weeks ago there were twenty-four activ, but one, the Rev. J. H. H. Brown, Episcopalian, has just resigned. His place, however, will speedily be filled, keeping the number up to thirty. Two thousand dollars a year is a low estimate to average for these, but putting the figure at that shows sixty thousand a years spent to establish religion in the navy.

In connection with this subject, the case of the Rev. J. H. H. Brown, Episcopalian, before mentioned, is of interest. We are indebted to Methodist hatred of Episcopalianism for the details of his particular steal. Not content with getting money he had no legal right to get, he has gone the government one better, and drawn money he made no pretense of earning. He had been in the navy more than ten years, but until April 1st of the present year he had never been to sea, and had but three years and seven months of shore duty. The amount of salary paid him up to April 1st was about $19,000, or more than $5,000 a year for the actual service rendered. The details are:

J. H. H. BROWN, LATE CHAPLAIN U. S. NAVY.

Entered service,	Jan. 23, 1874
Ordered to Navy Yard, New York,	July 26, 1875
Granted leave,	July, 1878
Navy Yard, Penascola,	Feb. 10, 1880
Sick leave,	Aug., 1880
Ordered to U. S. S. Hartford,	April 1, 1884
Resigned,	May, 1884
Waiting orders, 1 1-2 years, at $1,600,	$2,400
Shore duty, 3 years, at $2,000,	6,000
Leave, 1-2 year, at $1,600,	800
Leave, 11-12 year, at $1,900,	1,740
Shore duty, 7-12 year, at $2,300,	1,340
Leave, 3 2-3 years, at $1,900,	6,966
	$19,246
Total duty,	3 yr's and 7 mos.
Amount paid,	$19,246
At the rate of	$5,271 per year.

No doubt it is better that the chaplains should lie idle than that they should preach their superstition to the men and officers, but if they are the promoters of the morality they pretend to be, they ought to be honest enough to forego worldly wealth for which they render no equivalent. Imagin the Rev. J. H. H. Brown rebuking a ship's crew for taking what is not theirs!

The chaplains of Congress get $900 a session. The United States spends annually on these three services, therefore, about as follows:

Chaplains in Congress,	$ 1,800 00
" " Army,	84,600 00
" " Navy,	60,000 00
Total annual expenditure,	$146,400 00

And all this in direct and defiant violation of the Constitution. No sane man would pretend that employing nearly a hundred Mohammedan priests to preach to the government employees, was not establishing that religion. Yet the church has the impudence to pretend that the employment of Christian preachers on ships and government posts is not an abuse of power.

During the late unpleasantness with our Southern sister states, the North had a million men in the field. A chaplain went with each regiment, which consisted of nearly a thousand men. The North, therefore, in round numbers, had a thousand chaplains at $1,500 a year to tell God which side he ought to espouse. The Confederates also had a proportionate number. One thousand times fifteen hundred is one million five hundred thousand dollars per year, spent during the war. In four years, six million dollars were added to our national debt to pay a lot of men whose services were worthless. The expenditure for the same purpose of the navy could not hav been less than a couple of millions. The people hav been paying interest on that eight millions ever since. Since the war closed some three millions more hav been squandered on the loafing drones. In the last quarter of a century, Congress has devoted not less than eleven millions of dollars to the establishment of the Christian religion, and is continuing at the rate of nearly $150,000 annually.

Where is the authority for this vast expenditure? There is none. The churches simply ask it, and the politicians giv the money. They say it is done in response to public sentiment. No doubt it is the sentiment of the church-members, a paltry third of the population of the country, but to assert that the great mass of the people sustain this steal in the name of religion is to set a low estimate on the morality of the United States. The Democratic press and the Republican press of the country are keen in detecting robbery in their political opponents, but not a remonstrance do they utter against this misappropriation of public funds. They, too, are under the dominion of the religious power, and see that only which is for their interests to see. If their professions of legislativ economy are not all sham, let them aid the Freethinkers in preserving to the national treasury nearly $150,000 a year.

Freethought in England.

The National Secular Society of England held its annual conference June 1st. The annual report, read by Mr. Bradlaugh, the president, contains many items of interest. When the conference met last year two members of its executiv council were in prison for blasphemy, necessitating the appointment of a Prisoners' Aid Committee. This committee raised for the help of the persecuted £642 12s. 2d. Testimonials for the prisoners realized £379 3s. 9d. "These figures," remarked Mr. Bradlaugh, "giv ground for congratulation, for they mark the strength and organization of the party since the persecutions of forty years ago." At the same time these large sums were contributed other large amounts were voluntarily given to Mr. Bradlaugh to aid him in his legal contests. In connection with the imprisonment of Foote, Ramsey, and Kemp, the report rebukes the home secretary of England for making the statement that the imprisonment was for obscene libel, when Lord Coleridge had already contradicted that charge by anticipation.

Mr. Justice Stephen is thanked for his clear exposition of the blasphemy laws in all their odiousness, and for drafting a bill for their repeal—a bill, however, which could find no sponsor in a Christian parliament. But members of Parliament are now being pressed by the society, and hopes are not unreasonably entertained that the repeal of the laws will soon be accomplished.

The struggle for the abolition of the oath still continues in England and on the continent. In Belgium a bill for the abolition of the judicial oath is now before the Belgian parliament. In England a large number of the clergy of the church of England hav had the sense to petition for the substitution of affirmation in all cases where an oath is now required. One of the members of the Secular Society, the report relates, was summoned on a coroner's jury. He claimed to affirm, and being questioned by the coroner stated that he was an Atheist. He did not refuse to take the oath; had he gone so far as that the coroner could hav imprisoned him. He was not allowed to affirm, as the law does not permit it in the case of jurors. In this most states of America are many years ahead of the mother country. That the Evidence Amendment acts of 1869–70 do not apply to Scotland has also been emphasized the past year by the absolute rejection by the presiding judge of the evidence of an Atheistic witness. Mr. Bradlaugh asks the branches of the society to spare no pains to win the right of affirmation "without question, objection, or observation, on the simple demand of the person who, under any circumstances or in any place, is or might be now required by law to take the oath." This seems a small thing to ask for, but it will probably be many years before the Christians of England will grant it.

The society will aid the Freethinkers of Paris in celebrating the centenary of Pierre Denis Diderot, the great encyclopedist, on July 30th. Australia and New Zealand, being colonies of England, are cared for by the English Freethinkers. Some of the societies in those countries are affiliated with the National Secular Society, and all are in friendly relations with its officers. In South Australia an Inter-Colonial Conference has been held, well attended by delegates, and Mr. Joseph Symes, of England, is now lecturing in Melbourne, being sent to the country for propagandist work on the invitation of the Australian Freethinkers.

A paragraph of the report, which we copy in full, shows how the society proceeded in a delicate and difficult matter:

"Your Executiv has to report a very painful case. One of your members, a sober, honest, industrious, well-conducted man, employed in the building trade, having been defrauded of his wages under circumstancas of considerable aggravation, unfortunately carried away by ungovernable passion, irritated by insult and a blow, killed his employer with one of the heavy tools used in his trade. The case was carefully investigated and considered by your president, under authority of a special resolution of your executiv, and counsel was instructed in the hope to reduce the offense to manslaughter. Though the jury expressly negatived premeditation, and the man's good character was shown, the capital sentence was enforced. Under the supervision of Mrs. Besant, the widow left penniless, with one young child and one since born, has been cared for and placed in a small shop where she has the opportunity of earning a modest livelihood."

Several companies hav been formed by the branches during the year for the buying or building of permanent meeting-places and lecture halls. The rapid growth of the society leads Mr. Bradlaugh to caution the branches against contracting debts, and especially to be careful in the business of each branch. A general building society scheme will by elaborated and adopted so soon as the president is relieved of a few of his legal cares.

By the Burials act of 1880, Freethinkers desirous of being interred in church-yards without religious ceremonies must draw a form of testamentary authority providing for the appointment of a legal representativ, specifying some friend willing to act at the funeral. In Belgium, France, and Italy, civil funerals are very largely on the increase. The legal red tape of English law is one of the blessings conferred by a state church.

It appears that the children of Freethinkers being educated in Board (corresponding to our public) schools can be withdrawn from religious instruction on proper application by the parents. Whether or not the children are compelled to wait in the halls, as the Bloomfield, Iowa, teachers request, the report does not say. The number of such withdrawals is large and increasing.

The growth of the science classes maintained by the society has been such that larger quarters are demanded, and the whole of a floor has been secured in the same building with the Freethought Publishing Company. A laboratory will be fitted up, and chemical appliances purchased; also a reading-room with books of reference. Miss Hypatia Bradlaugh is legally qualified and will conduct the class in chemistry. Mrs. Besant gratuitously devotes a good share of her time to these science classes.

One recommendation of Mr. Bradlaugh's will fit this country as well as England. It is that some earnest friend in every town should watch the local press and constantly contradict the many misrepresentations of Freethought and Freethinkers which find publicity. In several municipal and school board elections the cry of "Infidel" and "Atheist" has been raised against candidates Mr. Bradlaugh finds peculiar pleasure in recording that in every instance such candidates hav triumphed over their opponents.

The recruits to the society during the year ending May 31st number 1,747. Sixteen new branches hav been organized. The receipts of the General Fund were some $2,000; the expenditures about $1,800. From the Benevolent Fund has been paid over $600, with over $400 in hand. Seventy-two branches hav received nearly $20,000. Although fewer new members were admitted this year than last, the number of renewals of membership is greater. Besides the Funds already mentioned, the Freethinkers contributed about $700 toward Mr. Symes's expenses to Australia.

It must be admitted that the organization of the Freethought force is much more coherent and solid with the Englishmen than with Americans. No doubt a great share of the enthusiasm is due to the constant and unremitting persecution to which, in one shape and another, the Secularists of England seemed doomed, but a good percentage can be traced to the plans of organization perfected by Mr. Bradlaugh, whose re-election to the office of president was heartily unanimous. The society, under his able, if somewhat imperious, directions, has been put on a business basis. No members or branches are carried on the books for show. A wholesome disciplin is maintained, which has resulted in a very compact and effectiv body. The small size of England, too, favors organization, as all the branches are within a few hundred miles of the Executiv, and can receive instructions at very short notice. Each state in this country ought to show as powerful and numerous a membership of the League as all of England. And when our League gets down to bed-rock principles we think it will.

The cable dispatches of last Saturday convey the intelligence of the further progress of Mr. Bradlaugh toward his parliamentary rights. The government action against him for sitting and voting in the House of Commons on the night of February 11th began Friday and continued on the following days. Mr. Bradlaugh conducts his own case, and, the dispatch says, more than holds his own with the attorney-general. Lord Chief-Justice Coleridge, the presiding judge, it is observed, obviously leans toward the persecuted defendant. The inclinations of the other two judges are not known. Mr. Bradlaugh won an important point on the last day of trial in the decision by the court that his act in administering the oath to himself is not contrary to any known statute. He lost a point, however, in failing to convince the court that the speaker had acted illegally in refusing to administer the oath without having Mr. Bradlaugh's religious unbelief proved. The court decided that this question must be reserved for the decision of the jury. Several of the Tory members of the House, being fearful that Lord Coleridge would prove to be a partisan of Mr. Bradlaugh, endeavored to prevent the case being tried before him. In this they failed, but they may be able to work upon the two other judges to an extent sufficient to defeat the ends of justice.

The Monument Dedication.

The meeting for the dedication of the Bennett monument was held at 220 East Fifteenth street, on Friday evening, the 13th. In spite of the oppressiv heat, the hall was full, nearly half of those present being ladies. The services consisted of music, speeches, and a poem. Mr. Samuel P. Putnam presided. Daniel Edward Ryan, chairman of the Monument Committee, in an earnest and eloquent address, formally presented the monument to the Liberal public. Mr. Putnam read a memorial poem, and then introduced Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, who gave some touching and most interesting reminiscences of Mr. Bennett, drawn from nearly ten years of close acquaintanceship with him. Mr. Andrews followed with further remembrances of the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Chamberlain, one of Mr. Bennett's most ardent defenders, spoke of the infamy of the Comstock persecution; and Henry A. Stone, whose acquaintance with the martyr-hero extends back to babyhood, paid him a glowing tribute. Finally T. B. Wakeman, in a magnificent oration, pronounced the benedictory words. The addresses were interspersed with music. Miss Adelina Peters drew marvelous melody from the piano; Mrs. McCune sang a beautiful song composed for the occasion, and Mr. Edward Boys contributed to the general harmony with his fine voice.

Next week we shall print a full report of the speeches, which were all of unusal excellence. The meeting was in every way a splendid success. There is an increasing enthusiasm in the Liberal movement in New York, much of which is due to the enterprise of Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, who is the leading spirit in our meetings. The name, too, of D. M. Bennett is a growing power for good. As all that was mortal of the man recedes from view, whatever failings he may be imagined to hav had pass from the memory. The magnificence of his achievements is being recognized as never before. The faults and the weaknesses of the clay are forgotten. Above all these looms the form of D. M. Bennett, the hero, the martyr, the apostle of liberty, the central figure in the Freethought movement of his day.

And yet, after all, those who did not know him as the kindly, generous soul he was, can never appreciate his crowning merits as a man.

Cremation in New York.

In printing Philip Peabody's communication on incineration of the dead, we deem it an appropriate time to introduce to the Liberal public the Cremation Society of this city. We insert for this purpose the exterior and interior plan of the proposed crematory. Several of the commissioners of the company are Freethinkers. James B. Brown, the president of the Board, is a Liberal well-known in business circles of this city; Dr. Bloodgood, the medical inspector at the Navy Yard, Brooklyn, is a Liberal; and all our readers know where Felix Adler stands. The other commissioners are Rev. J. D. Beugless, an advanced Christian against whom the only point that can be made is that he is the de facto chaplain at the Brooklyn Navy Yard; August Schwarzschild, E. C. Cockey, and E. A. Caswell. With the religious habits of these three latter gentlemen we are unacquainted. The capital stock of the company is $25,000, of which $12,000 or $15,000 has been subscribed, and the prospects are good for the rapid taking up of the remainder. The shares are $25.

In the center of the building is a room labeled "chapel." The word signifies its use as well as any. We understand the company intends to maintain no particular religious creed, but allow the manner of services to be directed by the friends of the deceased, who can invite their own orator to eulogize the departed. This would be in accordance with the American instinct of fair-play, and an example for the Philadelphians and Bostonians to follow when shall be completed the proposed similar institutions in those cities.

Letters from Friends.

SHAKOPEE, MINN., May 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find six month's subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am not permanently located here or I would take it for a year. It is the best paper I ever read. It has opened my eyes so wide that no Bible or church can ever blindfold me again; and you can be assured of a permanent subscriber in me.

Your friend truly, JOS. SCHROLL.

COAL CREEK, COL., May 31, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2, for which please send me twelve lectures on "Orthodoxy," by R. G. Ingersoll, and two trial subscriptions, as below.

With the petition for state secularization I did what I could under the circumstances, getting sixty names. I could hav gotten more if I had had more time. I think I hav got about half. I asked a Frenchman to sign it. He then said, "Why did you not come to me sooner? It makes me so glad as if I had five dollars."

The arguments that I hav had while taking around the petition are too numerous to mention.

A Liberal League could be very easily formed at Coal Creek, and if I come back here next winter I shall try to get it in order. I think we could interest the people as much as the parson, if not more. HENRY BEICHLING.

HUMBOLDT, NEB., June 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: There has been a great break-up here in the Presbyterian church. Their minister, the Rev. Kelsey, delivered a lecture on undenominationalism, and he took quite a liberal view of the matter. It was the straw that broke the camel's back. A portion of the mossbacks were going to lock him out, but did not. He was requested by the citizens to repeat the lecture, which he did in the Opera House. The house was filled to overflowing, and the end of it is that there is a split in the congregation, and a wealthy lady here is building a church, the name of which will be the People's Church. Mr. Kelsey lectures now and preaches in the Opera House, commanding good audiences, and the Talmage party hav got a minister that will suit them. He is full of hell-fire, and heavy on the elect. Thus they are falling, slowly but surely. Let the good work go on. A. M. ENOCH.

ST. JOHNS, ARIZONA, May 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2, for which send me the ANNUAL, and the balance I contribute to the Monument Fund. There are quite a number of so-called Infidels in this county; in fact, as Brother Talmage says, "the West is teeming with Infidelity." Brother Talmage is correct in this, and I hope to liv long enough to see common sense and reason take the place of fanatical superstition all over our great republic. There are many Mormons in this part of the territory who believe in and practice the precepts found in the Bible, and how in the name of reason the other Christian denominations can rave and hound at them is one of those things which I cannot comprehend. Consistency is said to be a jewel, but the orthodox churches surely lack this gem, for were they consistent in their belief they could not cast stones at the Mormons. If we take the New Testament as true and of divine origin, which I deny, there is not a true Christian in all Christendom, unless, perhaps, it be the Mormons, or Mormon church. For my part I wish THE TRUTH SEEKER were in every city, village, and hamlet in the United States; that all the churches were turned into schoolhouses, and the thousands of clerical drones were forced to earn their living as honest men are obliged to earn theirs. ALBERT F. BANTA.

BURNIP'S CORNERS, MICH., June 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am a regular subscriber of that best of all papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and if I am not intruding too much on your good nature, I would like to ask you for a little space in which to say a few words for my old friend, F. E. Sturgis, artist, of Upper Sandusky, Ohio. Mr. Sturgis was formerly a resident of this place, and spent his boyhood days here. I hav known him for many years, and know him to be a gentl eman of strict integrity, industrious, temperate, hind-hearted; and as for his abilities as an artist, he has few equals, allowing me to be judge. He is a fearless, outspoken Liberal. He never lets an opportunity slip to giv old orthodoxy a blow, even if he injures his business by so doing. There is none of the sneaking hypocrit about him. As has been said by Mr. S. A. Stewart, of Wayland, Mich., sickness and adverse circumstances hav reduced him to financial straits, and he needs help to get upon his feet again; but as he declines to accept donations, as was suggested by Mr. Stewart, and simply asks for work, and that at a low price, he should receive the patronage of every Liberal in the United States. And those who are blessed with an abundance of the filthy lucre should be liberal and not confine him to the low price that he has offered to do work for, but should pay him liberally, so that he may get out of present difficulties and enjoy some of the comforts of life.

I believe that I am the only person taking your paper here. There is quite a sprinkling of Liberalism here, but mostly of the skim-milk kind. They lack the moral courage to let their honest convictions be known. But, Mr. Editor, I am hoping for better days. THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal publications are making inroads fast in the ranks of orthodoxy, and in a few years an orthodox Christian will be a rarity.

Yours respectfully, C. A. BALL.

EL MONTE, CAL., May 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find five dollars to pay for the stanch old TRUTH SEEKER one year, and two dollars' worth of your Liberal gospel tracts, as per list within.

I made good use of the dozen "False Claims" by distributing them among the pet ewes of the holy flocks, who feed the bellwethers upon the wine, milk, and honey of our semi-tropics, through the gambling devices of grab-bags, fish-ponds, ring cakes, selling pools on the handsomest girl in the town, etc. And, what is the quintessence of meanness, by their schemes they wheedle nearly all the money out of nice young men and imbecil old ones, who are drawn into these games by the smiles and wiles of the gentler sex. Really there is much truth in the rough old miner's words, "God's middle-men hav the cheek surpassing an army mule" to thus use the angels of humanity as implements in order to bleed the purses of the male lobby members of the churches.

And then isn't it a glorious remuneration to be told in the next priestly harang, "He that disbelieveth will be damned!"

I judge you published some of my former communications, although I did not see that number of your paper, for I hav received of late many Liberal papers from all parts of the United States, and there are none I like, next to THE TRUTH SEEKER, better than Brother Bailey's Liberal, of Nashville, Tenn. After I get up a club of trial subscribers for your paper I intend to do so for the Liberal, that multum in parvo little sheet, which has metal that rings with a clear twang. I hope you will like my opinion of the little competitor in your trade, for, being somewhat of a chemist, I comprehend no ism or spirit that does not rest on a material substratum. Hence I belong to the same ungodly crowd with Brothers Winter and Bailey. Trusting you will excuse this verbose epistle, with a promis to be short and pointed in future, I am

DETROIT, June 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I wish you would exchange with the Chicago Express. You and they both need each other. The Express is ahead of THE TRUTH SEEKER in political reform, but they need THE TRUTH SEEKER to help them in religious Liberal ideas very much. While the Liberals are fighting all over the branches of religious oppression, while luxury, the root of all political and religious oppression, is allowed to flourish and propagate freely, the people of this land, and of the civilized world, must adopt the truth expressed by Charles Lever in his "Romance of Sir Jasper Carew," if they ever intend or hope to be free. In chapter xlvii he says that "whoever receives interest is a slave-owner and whoever pays interest is a slave." Now here is the key to all of the crime, vice, and misery in this country. As Brick Pomeroy said, the greatest crime ever committed was the sale by Congress to the money-lenders of the power to hav eighteen hundred and eight millions of money destroyed in 1865, so that from dire, distressful want of money the people might be compelled to go to the usurers and borrow their notes—their debts, called national bank notes—which are no more money than any other man's notes or debts; and since 1865, since this damnable bargain and sale of this nation into slavery, the debts hav increased to fully double the amount of the entire wealth of the nation. If the Liberals, instead of petitioning Congress for the secularization of the states, had given out the heading of a demand for issuing money to put the people out of debt, it would be striking at the root of the evils. It is true that whoever controls the amount of money in a country controls the lives and happiness of every person in it. Giv us liberty from debt, and the influence of churches will soon fade away with all other evils. The debt that the laborers of this country are expected to pay the interest upon, or hav the burden increase, is full enough to giv each and every one a good home, and furnish it well, leaving no more criminal or paupers. Why not work for liberty? J. H. WOOD.

HAMILTON, May 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am out on the prairie of Gallatin Valley making an irrigating ditch for farming purposes, some twenty miles from Bozeman, and hav been for six weeks, and for that reason I hav neglected to send in my subscription for your paper for another year. The time expired on the tenth of this month, but rest assured I will send some money as soon as I can go to Bozeman, for I must hav your paper. I received six all at once, and hav been reading Ingersoll's lecture in Chicago: That alone is worth the price of the paper one year. One of my friends said to me yesterday, "Joe, you will go crazy from reading that old TRUTH SEEKER." I told him I would take chances, and I wish more would do the same. This is a grand country for Freethought, and the majority of the people are Liberal, yet we hav a few strait-laced roundheads that believe a man must go to hell if he dares think for himself. Last winter I was working in the mountains above Bozeman, on the line of the North Pacific Railroad, hauling lumber and coal to the track, and there came one of those zealous bigots to the camp with a kind of toy wagon on wheels in the dead of winter. He should hav had it on runners. It It was a fancy box in a frame fixed with handle and springs to draw out by, and fasten when pushed in. That box was filled with tracts and religious trash which he seemed very anxious to distribute amongst us, and which met with so little favor that he soon tumbled to the fact that there was quite a number there that must hav better food for their mental digestion. Next morning after all the men had gone to work, he asked permission to pray with the lady of the house, the hired girl, and the children. So they had to kneel with him through a long prayer, which put them back with their work and which was very annoying to them, yet they had not the courage to tell him so, and he, like so many of his kind, was ever ready to take advantage of a woman's weakness. He wished to start a Sunday-school in that place. So the next Sunday some of the young teamsters went around and gathered from ten to fifteen women and children apiece, and went to a station house to hold Sunday-school. When he told them it was necessary to pay ten cents a head, in the language of this country, the boys kicked. They did not mind gathering a sleigh load of women and children, and taking them to Sunday-school, but they did object to paying ten cents apiece for them. This long, lank, lazy soldier of the cross was very anxious to save souls at ten cents apiece, but for their sake, and for Christ's sake, not one. So ended the Sunday-school in the Rocky Mountains. J. O. CLARK.

ELGIN, May 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In reading my Bible (I bought one at an auction for ten cents) I find there is a mint of money in it, and I feel confident that by publishing the inclosed for the benefit of the Young Men's Christian Association they will vie with each other to see who will lug up the patent first and go into the business. Hoping that some enterprising individual may be benefited by it, I am Yours truly, I. W. ARCHIBALD.

THE INCLOSED—MILLIONS IN IT.

Let a few of the boys get together, get a lot of rams' horns, go to some city, secure by some honest means a path round about the city on the extreme outside of it—for if not, the police might pick you up, and as you are on an honorable, praiseworthy mission you don't want to be disturbed by the city snobs. This done, you are all ready for the pile. All together march around the city seven times, blowing your rams' horns (be sure they are rams' horns). When you get around five or six times the inhabitants will be pretty well alarmed. Now is your time. Just quietly send a delegation to the city council, demanding—don't beg or pray, but simply demand—say two or three hundred thousand dollars, according to the size and the wealth of the town, which if they don't hand out promptly, tell them you hav only to march round their worthless town once or twice more, as the case may be, when their city will all tumble down, doing ten times more damage than the paltry sum you ask them. Don't you see the point? If you do, just go in and make money. As soon as you are through with one city go to another, and if the first one or two cities don't hand out the dimes just leave them in ruins. Others will soon hear of it and buy you off at once. Don't you see? It is as true as scripture. For fear others might try the same plan, I would recommend the boys to get out a patent right before starting. It would giv them a better chance, as they would hav Uncle Sam to back them if any of the foolhardy cities should kick against handing out the cash.

VINELAND, June 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find one dollar to pay on THE TRUTH SEEKER another spell. And as you giv space to the assertions of Mr. Perry, I hope you will find room for this. I am not in the habit of writing, or I would refute all Mr. Perry's false reasoning, and show up his wild assertions. As it is, I will point out a few. In his article in THE TRUTH SEEKER, May 24th, he says, "By the Materialists, the only thing accomplished by nature is the production of material forms, while that which perceives and knows of these forms is nothing, and dies with them." What Materialist says that that which perceives and knows of forms is nothing? Are the senses that perceive, and the brain which knows, not things. Again he says the Materialist asserts that all this seeming effort of nature is but the production of the best physical forms of organic matter, and that although the human consciousness is constantly advancing, or growing and accumulating, even while the body it inhabits may be changing and decaying, yet at death of the body, all the grand and stupendous images of thought must vanish like the mist before the morning rays, which is asserting that when nature has done her best she makes her greatest failure. This paragraph contains a number of false statements, but the concluding clause caps the climax. When nature produces a perfect physical form, is that form a failure? Does it not perform perfectly that for which it is adapted? Witness the ease and grace of motion of the perfect physical form; it is folly to call that a failure. It is also folly to say that the greatest intellects are failures. Is Shakspere a failure? Is Darwin a failure? Is Herbert Spencer a failure, and others whose thoughts hav benefited mankind, which benefits will last as long as the race? One more and I hav done for the present. He says, "We were developed in a previous world so as to inhabit this; we are developing in this world so as to inhabit a much higher and better one, in a much more advanced condition. And thus is nature every bringing higher things from lower ones." All human beings are produced and developed in this world; they grow and mature in this world, body and mind together; they also decay in this world body and mind together, and at death there is no more thought, as thought is but nervous motion.

P. ROTHWELL.

HUNTSVILLE, ALA., June 5, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: "A glorious thing to be crazy about," replied to me an elder of a church whom I met on a Tennessee river boat from Cincinnati, Ohio, to Florence, Alabama—720 milse. "Where do you liv?" I was asked. I answered, "In Huntsville, Alabama, where people are crazy on the subject of religion."

In Cincinnati, Ohio, I of course looked for that champion of Freethought, Thomas Winter, a hatter by profession. He livs at 265 West Eighth street, behind the cathedral, and in the most curious immediate neighborhood of at least six or eight churches; for right in front of the cathedral is the synagog at the corner; two other churches separated by a stable are fifty feet from the synagog. In fact, I never in all my travels saw as many churches in one mass. The wonder is that Brother Winter is not deaf from hearing the many bells on the Lord's day. Unfortunately that honest working man was so busy with his legitimate and useful profession that he could spare me but five or six minutes. I wished they were as many hours. Mr. Winter sends it right hot—calls a spade a spade, a thief a thief, a hypocrit a hypocrit. The great amount of good he could do in the lecture field, if so disposed, in incalculable. I regret exceedingly I saw so little of him.

Seeing a church advertised for sale, I of course applied. It is, if I remember well, the Second Presbyterian church, on Broadway. The sexton, living in a part of the church building, and looking more a corpse than a mortal, showed me around. "Suppose I buy the church, organ and all, for a music school, will I hav to pay taxes?" "Certainly," he said, "for I pay taxes myself for that part of the church I occupy, and as you intend the church for secular purposes taxes will hav to be paid on the church as well." "The Lord in his inscrutable wisdom has not blessed this church, it seems," I ventured to observe. The living corpse replied: "On the contrary, this is a wealthy church, but its members moved into the suburbs, and built a church there for convenience' sake." The church, an oblong, gloomy building, impressed me as a sub-lunar grave, and I was glad to leave it and behold the friendly sun again.

HENRI PALING.

PÓMONA, CALIFORNIA, May 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $7.25 for the THE TRUTH SEEKER to the people named. THE TRUTH SEEKER is growing in favor in Pomona; the prospect is favorable for its increase in circulation here. I shall avail myself of all opportunities of procuring subscribers and showing up to the best of my ability the advantages of Freethought in matters of religion. Is there any necessity for adopting any of the prevailing religions of this world? Do they improve the status of the human race, as practiced through the various church organizations? Is not the believer equally vindictiv and bloodthirsty as is the unbeliever in their doctrins? Is it not a fact that they (the Christians) figure about equally with the unbeliever in the criminal records of the country? Do not the crimes of the parson figure up about equal with the crimes of men of other professions? Does being baptized in the belief of the divinity of Christ, as preached and practiced by Christians, prevent the believer from violating law? Does the oath of a Christian prevent the Christian from perjuring himself? Is it not a (historical) fact that the greatest crimes hav been perpetrated by Christians in the name of Christ, and for the benefit of the church? Is it not easier for a member of any church to avoid punishment by law, than if he were not a member, or if he were an Infidel? Does a Methodist believe that a Universalist is as good a Christian as is the Methodist? Does any of the Protestants believe that a Catholic is as much in favor with Christ as is the Protestant? Does any Catholic believe that the Protestant parson is infallible? Does any one but a Christian believe in ghosts, and in hell, and rejoice in their existence? Does anyone believe that the Christian hell is of any benefit to the living or dead, to the saved or the damned? Or everlasting salvation by faith, or eternal damnation through lack of faith, is just and equitable according to humane methods of administering justice? Does anyone, with a spark of intelligence to guide them in their thoughts, believe that the thousand mummeries, flummeries, idiotic and nonsensical performances practiced in the various churches, hav a tendency to elevate mankind to enjoy a higher respect for himself and his fellow-man, or bring him in closer relations with and win the indorsement of a wise and infinit God thereby, at some future time, wafting soul and body to the new Jerusalem, to become the possessor of a harp, and enjoy the exquisit pleasure of waltzing around the big white throne in company with some winged angel, and behold the babe of Bethlehem, and possibly clasp him in their sacred arms, exclaiming, Hallelujah, blessed Jesus, how I love you; my love for you is increased ten thousand fold, because I am here and you hav been so good as to consign my darling boy, my loving mother, to everlasting torment, and possibly the balance of my loved ones yet to come? "This is the way I long hav sought and mourned because I found it not." Yes, dear Lord, fill up the bottomless pit with brimstone, intensify the heat, increase the pain by thy heavenly wrath for their unbelief; blessed privilege!

Excuse me, ye heavenly band, for not wanting to enter the portals of your kingdom. I would prefer to be turned over to his satanic majesty, there to reside with him for all time to come, hoping, by strict conformity to the rules of the institution, to arouse some little spark of sympathy with his majesty whereby the fires might be cooled off during the summer months. If the record is true, giv me the regions of the long-tailed demon instead of the new Jerusalem with all its fuss and feathers, milk and honey, harps and hallelujahs, golden streets and golden crowns, and its vindictiv, revengeful king, who would not forgiv us for failing to believe that which it was impossible for us to believe. Rather than either, let us be encircled with the cool arms of Mother Earth until she tenderly resuscitates us and brings us again into animated existence upon her maternal bosom, where we may become fragrant by the dews of night and made joyous by the tinted rays of morn until again the harvest time comes, and be made to serve some useful purpose in the great laboratory of nature, where no atom will ever be lost and nature's god will be our conservator, a blessing far greater than any theological God ever promised or can bestow upon us.

H. L. SHAUG.

JONESBORO, IND., June 1, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Perhaps a few items from the Freethinkers of a Western town may not be distasteful to the readers of your noble paper.

Out here amid the churches and priests of Grant county, Indiana, we hav a few men who dare to think on matters of theology, and also a number still fewer who dare to express their opinions on all subjects. Unless one has an established reputation, however, to become an Infidel here is to become, in a great measure, an outcast. We know of but one avowed Liberal, a drug merchant, who is respectfully recognized by the religionists. All others, however moral, are regarded as low and hard, and not fit associates for our self-styled respectable people. It was but yesterday that an aged relativ told my wife that she found a certain neighboring family quiet and moral, and seemed to be at a loss to know why they were regarded by many as low. Had she but heard spoken the portentous words, "The husband and father is an Infidel," no further explanation would hav been necessary.

A few of our number are trying to organize a Liberal Club. We do not know yet whether we shall succeed or not. We shall hav to content ourselvs with a membership of eight or ten if we do. Could all our young Infidels be prevailed upon to come out openly with their theological views a far more promising result would be assured. Two or three good lectures are what we need to bring them out, and to put a few big doubts in the minds of Christians. We were expecting a Mr. Day, of Portland, Ind., to deliver a lecture on Thomas Paine about the Fourth of July, but circumstances hav changed the speaker's purposes, and as a consequence the lecture has been indefinitly postponed.

As there are many Liberals who believe that Christianity, though a stupendous fraud, is yet a great moralizing agent, please permit us briefly to sketch our experience in attending church and Sabbath-school during a great part of the preceding year. Out of forty church services which we hav attended but three were devoted to moral instruction, and they by the minister of a half Infidel church (Universalist). In attending Sabbath-school for months we did not gain a half-dozen moral ideas of any kind. Twenty-five of the sermons of which we hav spoken were delivered in a town having not more than one thousand inhabitants, yet during a great part of the time sustaining four saloons. Notwithstanding this array of intemperance, we do not think that of the whole time devoted to those discourses five minutes in all were given to the subject. Now, the ministers conducting those services were not, as may be supposed, ignorant backwoodsmen, but were intelligent, well-informed men.

The above is written from memory, therefore if any portion of it is wrong, it is because our memory serves us falsely. Reader, form your own conclusion. Ours is this: Were we to rely on such teaching for our morals, we should speedily go to the dogs.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become indispensable to our happiness. That it may long fulfil its mission is the wish of

G. W. PEELLE.

CAWKER CITY, KAN., May 26, 284.

MR. EDITOR: About every issue of your paper contains an article on prohibition, for or against, and I hav read them all; and now it seems to me that few if any writers fully understand this question. Of course just here every generous person will say, Oh, what egotism! Don't we all know the serious effect of drinking? Is it not all around us, and hav we not a right to save them? Yes, you hav; but it has not been done yet, and after these several years of trial in Kansas I feel convinced that it will not be done by prohibitory law. Let me say right here that I hav been a water drinker for forty years, and am so now. I hav been several years in the drug business, and sold liquors; consequently I hav some knowledge of the ways that are resorted to to get liquor to drink, and when the prohibition question was coming forward I thought of drafting a bill to be laid before the house, but waited until St. John's bill had become a law; and on very carefully reading it I concluded that it was perfect, and would do the business thoroughly. Well, it does the business just as nicely as a sieve holds water. It is impossible to write a complete statement of the difficulty of enforcing the law unless one could command more space than could be afforded by THE TRUTH SEEKER. Indeed, I wish some one would write this matter up in a novel. It would be the most amusing and instructiv thing ever written. But perhaps it is better left out, as people learn villainy fast enought without having preceptors. But, pray, don't think that the liquor seller or the drinker is all to blame. Yet I must say that by our law a person can be committed to prison for his natural life for selling one drink of whisky, while another person may drink a barrel with impunity. But here is the greatest evil to the temperance cause. While this law has been enacted, I think, three or four years, I hav never heard of one temperance person getting liquor according to law. Of course most people use a little alcohol in wine for medicin, and there is a way provided to law to get it. But it costs something to follow that course, and it makes delay also. It should be understood that it is the druggists who sell the most liquor now, and they hav to pay the United States twenty-five dollars a year for the privilege, and that, if they sold only for medicin, as the law directs, the profits would not cover the expenses. Besides, they hav to giv a thousand-dollar bond to observe the law, so it can be seen that unless considerable sales can be made no liquors could be sold for any purpose. Now, let any person look around him and see how easy it would be to find a person who sells liquor according to law. I will say that I hav never seen the person that could do it, even if he were willing, because he would be imposed upon by the purchaser. Now let me tell of one example that covers many cases. I know of a young, thriving village eleven miles from any other town, and twenty from some. It has a complete and neat drug store. The owner cannot sell liquor under the stringent law, and the temperance people will not let him sell it without complying. Consequently it is not done, and of course people that need liquor hav to go to other towns to get it, and then purchase other goods that he sells at the same time; so his lawful business is ruined, and of course the effect is felt by others in other branches of business, as they lose custom at the same time. But there is another and worse feature to this business. If a person is engaged in selling liquor, and has a neighbor who would profit by his ruin, he sometimes complains, and law suits commence. A very large proportion of the cases are never proven, and very great cost is left to be paid out of the public funds. We hav one case here where four courts hav occupied several days, at great expense, and the defendant has not been convicted yet. Here is another case: A man sold liquor, quit the business, moved away more than a hundred miles, and eight months after was followed, brought back, tried, convicted, and imprisoned, but was pardoned by the governor. All this was done to make official cost and political capital, and this is but a very gentle hint at the immoral conduct of men to make money out of the law. I wish all the world could well understand the operation of the Kansas prohibitory law. It would save much money and time.

GEORGE W. CHAPMAN, M.D.

BOSTON, June 7, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Since Monday last I reside in the "Hub of the Universe." Provided that the climate proves more favorable in future than last week, I shall remain here. I left Spring Forge shortly after I had mailed that petition to you. Among those who signed are only four who are real, outspoken Liberals, but before I had come there they did not know it themselvs; the rest are also sensible enough not to meddle with church, parson, or salvation, but are rather afraid to confess. Nevertheless, they will now no more deny that they signed the petition after the whole town and neighboring farmers hav read my three sheets of "Explanation to the Petition of State Secularization," and, moreover, as even some church-members now think, the whole affair not only not anti-religious but evidently as undertaken in the interest of pure religion and common welfare. To this purpose, for those who may change their mind after my departure I left two copies of the petition with them in order that one or the other might yet hav an opportunity to sign. Shortly before my departure I was in greater danger than I thought of; a letter from Mr. B. S. Malaun informs me that about forty men had conspired to drum me out of town in one of the nearest nights, to "tar and feather" me, etc, you see—real Western style. The poor, miserable souls, who think themselvs Christians, did not consider that they would then hav played the part of the Jews whom the Christian gospel represents as the slayers of the Rabbi Jeshu, who, in the light of advancing historic investigation, will probably be undressed of all metaphysical and mythological masks and "seamless coats," and appear as a fearless reformer more or less worthy to stand on the side of the hundreds and thousands of male and female martyrs who died in the battle for truth and right. Mr. Editor, I hav experienced, both in Europe and this country, that the spirit of the crusaders yet dwells in the millions of hearts whither the light of secular culture has not yet entered.

Here, in Boston, I found a cordial reception by Mr. R. Sidelinger, a very industrious and cultured worker in the sublime cause of Freethought. Through him I was introduced to Mr. G. N. Hill, who is well known in the Liberal circles of this country, and whom I regard a true type of Liberal manliness and diligence. I should not be pleased to hav to depart again from this most cheerful company, in connection with which even my "weak strength" may prove of beneficent influence upon the bigotry and darkness around us. Mr. J. P. Mendum and Mr. H. Seaver encouraged me with their most friendly reception. I was surprised to find the Paine Memorial building of such magnificent and practical structure. It is, indeed, a comforting impression to the mind that was shortly before vexed by the the aspect of Girard College in Philadelphia, a temple dedicated by a dying friend of humanity to the cultivation of Liberal knowledge, but stolen by hands who love to be folded in adoration of the God of truth and justice (?). May there soon arise in the hearts of this nation the right spirit, the spirit of courage and constancy, to claim its own, to tear from the hands of Rome and her priests the gold that was earned by the callous hands of American free-born laborers; to fling back the lies into the faces of the sham reformers, to prove that the childhood of this people is passed, that they are a nation of men and women, and not the slaves of Rome or a book translated by the German monk. Before I close permit me to say that many Liberals find fault with the manner in which most Freethought papers and Almanacs date their issues, namely, with the E.M. 284 ("Era of Man)." This is an enormous long period which would not alone supersede the almost 6,000 years of the Jewish calendar, but which, as yet, frustrates all efforts of exact determination. Why should this period, which in its very beginning (1618–1648) is marked by a most cruel and religious war, be called the "Era of Man," while interceded by many periods of national welfare and peace, while really great men and women had lived before Christ, and Gregory, and Luther, and Frederick, and Galileo? I see the Paine Hall Calendar and some ten or eleven papers hav already adopted in its place A.S. (Anno Scientiæ), whereas it was thought proper also to recur to the year of the death of Giordano Bruno (1600), considering him the first martyr of true science and philanthropic investigation, but to name the period from the cause for which he died.

Yours sincerely, F. W. OPP.

And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

John.

John is a farmer, and holds the plow,
Plants the corn, and milks the cow;
Harrows and rakes, and tends the grain,
Digs and hoes, again and again;
Faithful and true to every trust,
I'm moved to say, and say it I must,
That of all the lads the sun shines on
None is equal to my friend John.

John is up with the earliest dawn,
And catches the bluebird's sweetest song;
Through pink and gold of morning sky
He scents the clover's sweetest sigh;
Views the millet and scans the oats,
While the linnet sings in thrilling notes,
That of all the lads the sun shines on,
None is equal to my friend John.

You should see the cows come at his call;
They know his step from spring to fall;
There is Minnie, Grace, and Katy, too,
Nannie, and Bess, and dainty Sue.
If those cows could speak I know they'd say
To-day, to-morrow, and every day,
That of all the lads the sun shines on,
None is equal to our friend John.

Then the horses, Kate and Fan, so neat,
They know every by-way, every street
From Bowenville to the market-place,
And they know, too, each kindly face,
And ofttimes say with a gleeful neigh,
As plain almost as words can say,
"Of all the lads the sun shines on,
None is equal to our friend John."

John has not time for dress and display,
For he is a toiler every day;
But for splendid eyes and glowing cheeks,
You may search the world for weeks and weeks,
And then agree with what I say,
That though he works hard every day,
Of all the lads the sun shines on,
None is equal to my friend John.

John is a thinker, a scholar, too,
With faith and courage to dare and do,
With a heart as tender and as true
As a rose just bathed in morning dew;
Manly and pure, upright and free,
Nature makes men of such as he.
And I am sure the sun shines on
No worthier one than my friend John.

John's hand is brown, but true as steel,
A strong, firm hand, whose clasp is leal;
It could never lead a child astray,
But only straight in the better way.
And if you knew John from day to day,
You would not think it too much to say,
That of all the lads the sun shines on,
None is equal to my friend John.

A Rainy Day Picnic.

"Oh, dear," cried Madge throwing herself into a chair, "it always rains when I want to go any place. We would hav had such a nice time to-day in the woods, and now it is all spoiled and the girls will be so disappointed," and she scowled and pouted.

"That is because you wanted to hav a picnic after your own fashion," said John, with a smile.

"Just as if my style is not as good as any other style," said Madge.

"Why, I think this is a delightful day," said Helen, who was mending an old water-proof skirt; "I love a day like this, and I am not going to stay in the house, either."

"Why, Aunt Helen, what can you do out of doors a day like this?" Madge asked, in surprise.

"Hav a good time of course," said Helen, "and if you will go along I will show you how to enjoy a rainy day out of doors. This rain is just a nice drizzle-drozzle, such as the old deacon prayed for, so we will not get very wet. Now make haste and put on an old dress and thick shoes and rubbers, your gossamer, or waterproof, and we will be off."

In a short time they were ready, Aunt Helen, Uncle John, and Madge. John carried three fishing poles, Helen a basket of lunch, and Madge an empty one for flowers, ferns, and moss. They crossed the meadow, climbed the fence, and entered the woods where it was quite dry. The birds were singing as though they were glad it was raining. The rain made fine, tinkling music on the leaves, the flowers smiled in the wet grass, and Madge began to think it was not so bad to be out on a rainy day. After walking about a mile, they came to a ravine through which flowed a clear stream. Here they stopped, while Johh got the fishing tackle in order, and then they scattered along the stream to fish. John soon went off by himself, as he said he could never catch trout when women were around, as they would talk and frighten the fish away.

Madge and Helen determined they would show him that he was mistaken, and they were doing very well, waiting for bites, when Madge espied a beautiful bank of moss and ferns, and the fish were immediately forgotten, while both Madge and Helen went to digging with much energy. Then there was a great mass of lovely sweet-williams just beyond, and they must hav them, and some pretty pebbles from the brook to put with the moss and ferns.

Then Madge climbed a tree for a deserted bird's nest. While they were resting, and surveying their treasures with much satisfaction, they heard a great splashing in the water where they had left their fish lines, and running quickly to the spot, they found a fine fish trying to get away with one of the lines. It was soon drawn out and strung on a forked willow twig. As they caught more fish when not fishing, they set the line and again left it.

By the time their basket was full of woodland treasures, John returned with a string of nice trout, and declared he was hungry enough to eat donation oysters, whereupon Helen brought forth the lunch basket, and seating themselvs on stones and stumps, they began their lunch.

"Well, Madge," said John, "how do you like rainy day picnics?"

"Why, I had forgotten it was raining," said Madge, looking about her. "I think it is just splendid.

"Just watch the water and see how pretty it looks when the rain-drops strike it," said Helen.

When they had finished their lunch, packed away the dishes, and scattered the crumbs for the birds, and some in the water for the fish, they walked down the ravine to see a water-fall that John knew of.

They watched the water dashing over the rocks, and foaming up in snowy masses where it struck the bottom of the basin. Then returning, they gathered up their baskets and fish, and started homeward. When they came out of the woods into the open meadow, the rain had ceased, and there was the promis of a beautiful sunset. When they were at home once more and the flowers, moss, and ferns arranged in an old platter for fernery; the fish sent to the kitchen, and the picnic party arrayed in dry garments, Madge said she would not care if it rained every holiday if she could hav such a good time. AUNT MAB.

Our Puzzle Box.

SQUARES.—HOW THE "FORMULAS" ARE OBTAINED.

On a square, flexible sheet draw the square, full size of sheet. Place the first number in the top cell of the center column. To find the next cell to be filled, bring the top and bottom edges of squares together, forming a horizontal cylinder, and place the next number in the next cell upward to the right oblique, and continue thus to fill the cells in this oblique line until you find it already occupied or until you reach the right-hand margin. If you find a cell in the oblique line with a number already in it place the next number directly beneath the last and continue to fill as before. But if you reach the right margin, change the horizontal cylinder into a perpendicular one by bringing the right and left edges of the square together, and then continue upward in the right oblique line as before. It perhaps is well to remark that when you fill the upper right-hand corner the cell just beneath is the next to be filled.

THE WHY.

If it were required that only the columns should add alike we migh obtain the result by simple line "zig-zags," thus: $\left\{\begin{matrix} -1\ 2\ 3 \\ 4\ 5\ 6 \\ 7\ 8\ 9- \end{matrix}\right\}$ and now by bringing the 3 and the 7 to the blanks in their lines in the square we obtain the square $\left\{\begin{matrix} 3\ 1\ 2 \\ 4\ 5\ 6 \\ 8\ 9\ 7 \end{matrix}\right\}$ whose columns will add the same; but by double zig-zagging, as I hav shown, we obtain the same result in every direction. This same principle underlies Addison's work, but somewhat in disguise. His exterior supplemental cells are really only fragments of similar squares adjacent to the primary; and then transferring the numbers temporarily placed in them to the corresponding place in the primary square. Thus it becomes identified with my method, which carries the "why and wherefore" much more plainly on its face. I can scarcely call Addison's remarks a criticism, but I must thank him for the notice, but especially for his own fine work. As an empirical rule it is better than mine. It is all novel to me. I never saw anything on the subject before. J. K. P. BAKER.

NUMERICAL.

Take 6732 as a multiplicand, and multiply the same by any figure, or any number of figures, without my knowing what the multiplier is, and when it is accurately multiplied, and correctly added, then cross off any one of the figures (not a cipher), and tell me the figures not crossed off, and I will then tell what figure was crossed off. A WORD OF WELCOME TO MISS BANNERJEE.

DEAR MISS BANNERJEE: I wish to send you just one word of welcome in your distant home—one word of hearty welcome to THE TRUTH SEEKER ranks.

It is very pleasant for us here in America to know that even as far away as India, the seeds of truth are being sown by that standard-bearer of liberty, THE TRUTH SEEKER, whom all honest Liberals love so well.

Your father is entirely right in telling you not to belive what the Christian missionaries tell you. Even you are quite large and old enough to laugh at their silly and dishonest stories.

I hope you may liv to grow up to be a stanch, fearless Liberal, and do all in your power to root out the poisonous doctrins that the impertinent and self-appointed saints of Christianity are trying to force upon your countrymen, almost at the point of the bayonet. Good-bye, and remember that thousands of eyes hav read your excellent letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that thousands of hearts will henceforth beat in sympathy with your future work in India. BY J. G. HERTWIG.

BEES! BEES! BEES!

FROM $2,000 TO $5,000 A YEAR KEEPING HONEY BEES.

The particulars are simple to prevent the great loss that most bee masters have to contend with annually. Then give the bees a chance to increase and collect surplus honey to their fullest capacity; all of which can be easily accomplished by using the kind of hive described in "Kidder's Secrets of Bee-keeping."

Send for the Book and see how easily it can be done with a few swarms of bees.

THIS BOOK IS A RELIABLE GUIDE

to all persons that keep bees, especially to the novice or new beginner, as it teaches how all of the troubles and disappointments that the bee master is liable to, can be successfully overcome, such as Foul Brood, Dysentery, Bee Robbery, Ravages of Moth Millers, Loss of Queen, loss of bees in Swarming time, by their flight to the forests, also the great loss in winter and early spring management, which is usually more than all other ways combined. This book will also inform the bee master HOW BEES WILL INCREASE AND THROW OFF SWARMS to an enormous extent, all conditions being favorable. The old stocks will frequently swarm three or four times each, and oft times the first swarms thrown off will swarm once or twice each with a good hive and right kind of management. In warmer climates the bees will increase and swarm to a much greater extent.

GREAT YIELD OF SURPLUS HONEY.

This Book will inform the bee master how to get the greatest amount of surplus honey, and at the same time hive it in small packages weighing three-quarters of a pound to two or three pounds, as may be desired, which will command the highest price in market. In a good season the bee keeper may calculate on two or three hundred pounds of surplus honey from each old stock, and from fifty to one hundred pounds from the earlier young swarms, especially if they do not over-swarm.

NO MORE BEE-STINGS IN MANAGING BEES.

The Book will post the bee-keepers how to manage them when putting them on, or taking off surplus honey boxes, and not get stung in the whole operation.

BEE-KEEPING FOR OUR SONS AND DAUGHTERS.

It being the most pleasant, as well as the most profitable business that young people can engage in, and at the same time remain at home with their parents. The author has known of several young men who commenced the culture of the bee in their teens, and are now making more money than their fathers who run the farm, and doing it easily and with small investments. We must also remember that the women folks often make the best of bee-keepers, and not so liable to neglect them as the men folks.

KIDDER'S BEE BOOK

should be in the hands of all persons who like honey, and take an interest in the little honey bee. It contains more matter than many books that sell for two dollars, and is embellished with numerous cuts and drawings. There is no trouble, loss, or damage that a bee master has to contend with but what the book will give the proper remedy by simply referring to the index, and that will point to the page where it is fully explained.

In order to bring this book more prominently before the mass of bee keepers, the Author proposes to give, as a premium to each purchaser of a book, from this date until July next, the privilege of making his Celebrated Patent Bee Hive, as spoken of in book, for their own use (but not to sell) Free of Charge, otherwise there will be the usual Patent Fee of Five Dollars to each individual that wishes to make and use the hive

PRICE, BOARD BOUND, 75 cents; CLOTH, 85 cents.

N. B. The directions for hive making with cuts, drawings, etc., will be inclosed within each book sold, until July next, (not longer). Now is the time for all bee-keepers to avail themselves of this liberal offer, which is simply to buy a book at the Regular Price, before July next.

FRONT VIEW OF A PROPOSED CREMATORY.

INTERIOR ARRANGEMENT.

Cremation.

The subject of cremation is one that first came prominently before the people of this country about nine years ago. When we consider the importance of the questions involved in the disposition of our dead, those of us who are at all thoughtful are astounded that until so recent a time no considerable number of persons activly engaged in agitating it.

The first advantage cremation possesses over burial, that I shall notice in this article, is that of avoiding disease, which is engendered to a far greater extent than is known to most persons by emanations from decomposing human bodies. This disease is spread by contamination of water-courses in and adjoining burial grounds, by the atmosphere, by reproduction from germs that hav been buried—i. e., actually planted—but not killed. The grave is, therefore, in one sense, a disease factory. The epidemics that follow wars are undoubtedly the "crop" of the buried corpses and disease germs. The percentage of deaths is much larger in the neighborhood of cemeteries than elsewhere; the air of cemeteries contains more than double the normal amount of carbonic acid, the proportion being that of nine in cemeteries to four elsewhere. Experiments at Stuttgart proved that poisonous emanations from a graveyard, when the number of burials averaged only ten per week, were carried by the wind and were perceptible several hundred yards away. Charles Darwin, as long ago as 1837, and Pasteur more recently, hav presented formidable facts for the reflection of those who oppose the avoidance of plague generators in the cemeteries that surround, and, in too many cases, are embedded in our cities; the latter showed that earth worms bring to the surface millions of bacteria from decomposing bodies. Every instant of time, day and night, over sixty thousand human bodies are decomposing a few feet below the surface of the earth in and around New York. (Sir Henry Thompson) "No dead body is ever placed in the soil without polluting the earth, the air, and the water above and below it." Each decomposing human body generates annually about fifty cubic feet of carbonic acid gas, and other poisonous exhalations. The blood of persons dying of some diseases may be dried, kept for years, and pulverized, and yet the germs of the disease liv with power to produce the disease.

Truly, God must hav devoted ages of time and thought to hav "designed" so diabolical and wicked a scheme; is it possible to hav any feeling for him but that of hatred and contempt, too great to be expressed in all appropriate adjectivs in all the languages of the world? An investigation of the causes of a recent epidemic of yellow fever in South America disclosed the interesting "fact that the soil of the cemeteries in which the victims of the outbreak were buried was positivly alive" with "organisms exactly identical with those found in the vomitings and blood of those who had died in the hospitals of yellow fever." Earth was taken from one foot under ground over the remains of a person buried one year before; it was found to be thickly charged with these germs. There is no doubt that our cemeteries are being prepared to be plague spots to ourselvs and generations who succeed us.

Washington Square was, prior to the year 1806, the Potter's Field of New York. At that day science had not discovered that the soil, saturated with the emanations of decomposing bodies, would continue for hundreds of years a source of disease. To this day it is said that a dense blue haze, several feet deep, rests every calm morning over Washington Square; certain it is that physicians who hav lived for many years in its neighborhood declare that it is impossible to raise children on the ground floors of houses in that vicinity; and yet children are turned, by hundreds every clear day, into this park for health and recreation.

There is not a single large cemetery about New York, I believe, where three or more bodies are not put into one grave. In the great Woodlawn and Greenwood cemeteries this is notoriously the case. In the "public" part of Calvary cemetery I am informed, a trench is dug seven feet wide and about eleven feet deep (of length to suit convenience), in which coffins are piled five or more deep.

An advantage which is hardly less important than the avoidance of disease is the avoidance of burial alive. The number of human beings who are buried alive is positivly known to be vastly larger than is popularly supposed. It is an ascertained and admitted fact that there are conditions of the body when life is apparently extinct when it really is not so; not only is this the fact, but it may not become extinct until an indefinit length of time elapses and the person becomes conscious. To those who hav watched at death-beds and seen men die, as I hav many times done, this seems not so hard to realize as it does to those who hav only seen the human body in a state of health, with death apparently far off, or else after death. Unfortunately for society, it is of course but very seldom, comparativly, that it is known that any particular person is buried alive; we hear, however, almost weekly if not daily of cases of corpses which accident or some unforeseen necessity has caused to be disinterred, where life had undoubtedly not only not been extinct but when consciousness had ensued, as shown by the convulsed features, altered position of the limbs, flesh of the arms being eaten away, straining eyeballs and other indubitable proofs. I recollect of several such cases recently reported in the New York and Boston papers; also of one of a woman who had had a child partly born in the coffin.

The danger of burial alive is recognized, and the possibility dreaded by all thoughtful, well-informed men. A theological student at New Brunswick was placed in his coffin for burial some years ago, friends believing and physicians "pronouncing" him dead. One friend begged so persistently for postponement that for more than four days after the time fixed for the funeral he was kept in his coffin, and finally revived and lived, the accounts said, a useful life of many years. (From this we are justified in inferring that he did not become a clergyman.)

In times of epidemics of contagious diseases, when it is important to get the supposed dead bodies under ground as soon as possible, there is especial danger of burial alive. This was shown recently at Norfolk and Portsmouth. The late Charles A. Reed, of Massachusetts, directed his physician to sever his head from his body after death to prevent any error in regard to his being dead, and left him a bequest of five hundred dollars for this service. The renowned Garibaldi, as is well known, left instructions for his body to be cremated, but they were disregarded; let it be recorded to the disgrace of those who were responsible.

By a singular coincidence, while I sit writing, my eye involuntarily falls on a newspaper of this morning and on this item:

"They were about to bury a grandchild of Gen. Turner, of Memphis, when some one insisted that it should be bathed and slapped on the back. It is now alive and doing well."

A third advantage of cremation is its economy. This is an advantage that cannot be enjoyed until cremation supersedes burial to a far greater extent than it has yet done, and, I fear, to a greater extent than it is likely to do for some years. It has also been said with much justice that it is an advantage that cannot be fully realized long after cremation becomes fashionable, as there is probably no limit to which extravagance might not and would not go in having expensiv urns—assuming the actual cost of cremation to remain constant at a low figure—and it is to be feared that the poor would feel obliged to ape the wealthy in this respect exactly as they now feel obliged to imitate them in various ways, and more recklessly in the case of funerals than of anything else. Still, under the worst state of affairs, it is almost certain that the expense of funerals would be less than it is at present. If I may be permitted to express my own opinion, I would say that I think if the ashes were scattered to the winds in some vacant or wooded spot near the crematory and thus was accelerated what eventually must take place, the return of the elements to nature and their absorption into other living bodies, it would be far more poetical and beautiful in idea, and better in every way; and not the least advantage would be the tendency to put the rich and poor on a social level. The expense attending the funeral of a person who has died in moderate circumstances is at the present day somewhat alarming. The cost of burial lots in Woodlawn or Greenwood is about $75 per grave. A single grave in a public lot is $25. An ordinary headstone and footstone cost about $100, including the expense of erecting them. Eventually, and perhaps at a not remote day, all of these graves will be desecrated, and perhaps not a single body of the many thousands now buried therein will find another known resting-place.

So far as what is popularly known as "sentiment" is entitled to respect, cremation would be conduciv to it in the opinions of all those who are not grossly ignorant of what occurs in the grave. Not one person out of one thousand could look at a human corpse in the various stages of decomposition without a feeling of extreme horror and disgust. Do not most people assiduously avoid thinking, even for a moment, of, not the actual condition, but what they suppose is the condition of the body of any friend? If the truth were known to all as it is to some, it would be readily admitted that nothing but extreme and unaccountable ignorance would keep alive the custom of burying our dead.

One more advantage of cremation that is perhaps worthy of mention here is that the more ignorant of the Christian ministers of New York and vicinity, notably Mr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, are opposing it and denouncing it as "heathen" and "unchristian." I take it an unchristian burial is exactly what most intelligent and educated men and women—thousands of whom do not dare to say so—are desirous of having. No custom is more repugnant and offensiv to most educated people than the torrent of ignorance, falsehood, and stupidity with which well-informed persons are regularly and habitually well-nigh overwhelmed at Christian funerals, and of which the funeral service of the Protestant Episcopal church almost exclusivly consists. I know of no ceremony of that church—and I am thoroughly familiar with all of them—where this is so strikingly the case. The celebration of the "holy communion" is certainly comical, and, on account of the loathsome cannibal ideas which it contains, is disgusting, but I do not think the service as contained in the prayer book contains as many ignorant falsehoods as that of "the burial of the dead." Surely the lack of the Christian element is to be considered as one of the great advantages of cremation. We hear so much of the failure of the life of the ignorant, wretched man who died in such a cowardly way on Calvary at all other times that we certainly ought to hav the luxury of forgetting him when at the funerals of those whom we presumably loved or at least respected. Certainly the adherents of that religion whose favorit method of immolation has been fire, the slow burning of living men, women, children, and brutes, should, from motivs of modesty and delicacy, if not from better ones, be the last to object to the comparativly instantaneous burning of a dead body, especially when it is advocated largely by philanthropists and from philanthropic motivs. Can it be that Christians, not having the power, although far from lacking the desire, of torturing people openly at this day, still wish to retain the occasional opportunity of burying them alive, as a solace to their tender hearts? Otherwise what motiv can they hav? Surely the gods, virgins, saviors, saints, holy ghosts, and angels in whom they trust ought to hav power to resurrect a cremated body if they try hard. Let them beware of belittling the power of their God.

In regard to the actual operation of crem ating a human body, a few words may not be out of place. I here quote verbatim from a work on "Cremation," originally published in the Princeton Review, to which I am indebted for many facts that I hav embodied into this article:

"The body is borne into the chapel and placed on a catafalque which stands in front of the altar. The section of the chapel floor upon which the body rests constitutes the floor of a lift, or elevator. As the funeral service proceeds the elevator invisibly and noiselessly descends, bearing the body to the basement directly in front of the incinerator, which by means of super-heated air, has been raised to a white heat within, at a temperature of about 1,500 degrees Fahrenheit. As the door of the incinerator is opened to receive the body, the in-rushing cold air cools it to a delicate rose tint, and the body, resting on a metallic bed, covered with a cloth of asbestos, or of linen soaked in alum, passes over rollers into this bath of rosy light. Immediately it becomes incandescent, in which condition it remains until incineration is complete. This requires about an hour per hundred pounds of the original weight. There remains only a few handfuls of pure, pearly ashes, equivalent to about four per cent of the original. These are dropped by means of a lever into the ash-chamber below, and are drawn thence into an urn of terra cotta, marble, alabaster, or other suitable material, and returned by means of the elevator to the catafalque. The service or ceremony being now over, the friends of the deceased find the ashes just where they had last seen the body of the departed, and may bear them thence to the columbarium or mortuary chapel, or set them in the border and plant violets, heartsease, and forget-me-nots in them from year to year.

"No fuel or flame substance comes in contact with the body. The process is accompanied with no sound or smell or smoke—absolutely nothing that can offend the sensibilities of the most fastidious. All the smoke and volatil products of combustion are passed through a regenerating furnace before being turned loose into the air, and are absoletely purified. The process is indeed in every way so decorous and so beautiful as compared with other methods of disposing of the dead, that it is described by those who hav witnessed it as 'fascinating,' and scarcely an instance is known of any one having witnessed the process, as thus conducted, who has not at once become a pronounced convert to cremation, whatever may hav been his pre-existing prejudice."

From this quotation, which explains the process far better than I could do without it, it will be seen that the popular belief concerning it is erroneous.

Of course I do not expect that any considerable number of persons will be at once converted to an approval of cremation, in consequence of a perusal of this hastily written article. I believe, however, that all discussion of this subject tends to bring about this much-needed reform, and it is in consequence of this belief, as well as a firm conviction that the time when the Christian religion and its adherents can prevent or materially postpone necessary changes of customs, as it and they hav so frequently done in earlier ages, is forever past, that I hav written on this subject. I write in no spirit of controversy, nor am I willing needlessly to shock or offend even those for whom I hav little respect. If we must, speaking of the past, still say with Rosalind, "Men hav died from time to time, and worms hav eaten them," at least, as a consequence of cremation becoming the custom, let us also be able to say with Laertes, looking to the future, "From her fair and unpolluted flesh may violets spring." Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was strioken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

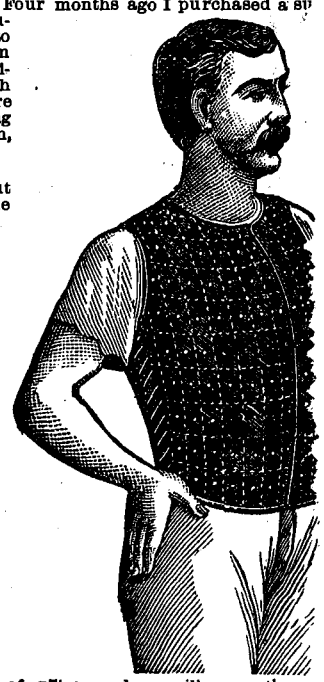
OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 18

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfe FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD T. ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidl I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will re again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in than six weeks after putting on the garments, a although in bed, unable to get out, when app she nevertheless was able to ride twenty mile two days after the application. The lady's n can be had upon application at this office, by one desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the ch were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a d medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do not for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost a sire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physi of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tu and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew ra worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a su your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

A PETITION FOR STATE SECULARIZATION.

To the Honorable Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress:

A republican form of government being based on liberty, equality, and fraternity, as both means and end, involves the separation of Church and State, whose union is the worst form of class-legislation and the most infallible sign of arbitrary power. A house divided against itself cannot stand. The institutions of this Commonwealth should be made homogeneous throughout. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of truth in whatever direction. Any infringement by government of this absolute equality of its citizens is the parent of manifold evil, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, this government was founded to "establish."

And yet, though the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," there does exist a union of Church and State, which gives to Christianity moral and material aid, and so proscribes other religions and forms of belief and unbelief, while taxing these also for the support of that special religion.

The ways in which this old alliance between Church and State still survives among us are:

1. Recognition of God and Christianity in State Constitutions.
2. Exemption of Church property from taxation.
3. Appropriations of public money for sectarian purposes.
4. Religious exercises, as the reading of the Bible, etc., in the public schools.
5. Laws enforcing the observance of the Sabbath on the authority of the Bible.
6. Religious test-oaths in courts of justice and on instalment into office.
7. Chaplaincies in the Legislature, the Army, and the Navy.
8. Fast and Thanksgiving Proclamations, which contain theological ideas that may or may not be acceptable to the citizen.

The necessity for this separation of Church and State is more apparent now than ever before, because of the still greater diversity of religious beliefs, the many forms of dissent from the religion which receives State patronage, and the growing signs of sectarian strife and ambition in the arena of politics. And emphasis needs to be given to the fact that the union of Church and State is a great hindrance to the employment of right methods in dealing with many questions of reform now demanding attention. And most essential is it at all times, and especially in the present, in order to secure for the law its due respect and observance, that the people's representatives should exhibit the strictest fidelity to their trusts by following the law in its letter and spirit.

Your petitioners, therefore, pray that immediate action be taken by the law-making power to bring into harmony the theory and practice of our government in making the following principle a part of the fundamental law of the land by amendment to the United States Constitution:

The total separation of Church and State, by prohibiting Congress or any State, County, Municipality, or Township from enacting any law that favors religion in any of the eight ways specified, or in any other way, or prohibits the free exercise thereof.

Odds and Ends.

A BENT pin on a chair is an indication of an early spring.

"IF I were in California," said a young fop, in company the other evening, "I would waylay some miner with a bag of gold, knock out his brains, gather up the gold, and run." "I think you would do better to gather up the brains," quietly responded a young lady.

"WHERE do you liv, my little man?" asked a gentleman of a diminutiv specimen on one of our railroad trains a few days ago, "I hav the pleasure of residing—" "Never mind," observed the old gentleman, interrupting him; and leaning back, he thought to himself: "How easy it is to tell a Bostonian!"

A VERY small Speck was climbing up the milky way, one moonlight night. "Ah, my little fellow, where are you from?" asked the Big Dipper. "Me? I'm from a grocery store down on earth." "How do you come to be away up here?" "Oh, I've been getting higher and higher year after year; and smaller and smaller, too." "That's funny. Who are you?" "I'm the bottom of a strawberry box."

JAMES HENRY'S DESIRE.

He ambled along down the stone-flecked lane,
And out from his midst there frequently came
A full-strength cuss-word, deep and low,
As he knocked a nail from a wanton toe;
And he wished he was dead'n Socrates,
And the robins rang out a chime from the trees.

And he wished—as he stepped on a business brier,
Which made him reflect, "by gosh, Mariar"—
That he was a hundred miles away
From the farm and the meadow and making hay,
And "Brindle" and "Bright" and the kicking cows,
And the blackbirds sang in the alder boughs.

Now a Poet, who sat on a moss-hid stump,
With his face in a smile and his back in a hump,
Had heard the boy as he muttered away;
And he called him hither and bid him say
What life he'd choose if he had his pick?
And the brown thrushes piped from a new-built rick.

And the lad looked up with his eyes in mist,
And, cutting a snack of "Virginia Twist,"
He paused for a moment, then, child-like, said,
As he dropped on his bosom his old-gold head:
"Please, Mister Sir, if it's all the same—"
And the thrill of a thrush from a hedgerow came—

"Please, Mister Sir," the boy began,
And tears coursed down through the fuzz and tan;
"'S if's all the same, an' I had my pick,
I could tell ye so suddink 'twould make ye sick—
I'd be a cashier in a savings-bank,"
And the Poet fell over, limp and lank.

And this simple child, with his tender thought,
From his sweet desire his wish has wrought;
And he rides in a chariot gilt and gay,
And the Poet is up on the box, they say.
And the world hies hence with its jam and jerk,
And the birds, as of old, get in their work.

THE WAIL OF THE HEBETUDINOUS.

[We hav made the interesting discovery that the most hebetudinous crank anywhere within the bounds of latitude and longtitude livs in the town of Cleveland, and edits a newspaper called the Leader.—N. Y. Sun.]

Oh, put me away in a grave-yard cool,
Amid verdure damp and dank;
For I am the man whom Dana called
A Hebetudinous Crank.

Oh, bury me deep with a stone on top—
I am feeling extremely bad,
And lay me to rest where Holman sleeps,
'Neath the weight of a liver-pad.

Oh, fain would I lie on some desolate heath
Where the jack-rabbit gaily bounds,
By the side of the good man weighing about 250 pounds.

Would you know why I wail in my deep despair,
Like captivs their chains who clank?
'Tis because I'm the man whom Dana called
A Hebetudinous Crank.

I hav tied my head in a moistened cloth,
And cleaned out my brain with a swab,
And thought and thought what it signified—
That etymological gob.

I hav thought, and thought, and thought in vain
What the phrase might signify;
But I never hav guessed, and I sometimes dream
That he knows no more than I.

I hav been a very bad man, I know,
I hav murdered my fair young bride,
And hammered the head of my cooing babe,
And spread him out flat at her side,

I've committed arson and burglary,
I hav busted full many a bank;
But what in the world hav I done to be called
A Hebetudinous Crank?

There are times, of course, when my grief is sore,
And myself I should like to hump,
And sling it back in his false, false teeth:
He's a pachydermatous chump.

I should like to call him an isotherm,
And a fulmeniferous plug;
And bring the blush of binomial shame
To his antiphlogistic mug.

But I know that I never, no, never on earth,
Can rival that awful word—
The meanest, and newest, and cussedest cuss
That a mortal has ever heard.

So take me away, and plant me deep,
Where the pattering pine-cones drop,
And the ages that roll will cover my bed
With strata of coal on top.

And savants to come, as they dig me out,
From fossilized foliage rank,
Will explain to the world what it is to be
A Hebetudinous Crank.

IT is a singular fact that the ablest men in either branch of Congress did not hav the advantages of a collegiate education. This applies to Edmunds, Sherman, Wilson, of Iowa, Bayard and Pendleton in the Senate, and to Randall, Carlisle, Kelley, McKinley, Reagan, and Curtin in the House.

REV. DR. DEEMS tells his congregation to go to sleep if they feel sleepy in church; that both he and the Lord will forgiv them, but he insists that they must sleep quietly. Dr. Deems has what might be characterized as a great head. If he can keep his congregation under his eye, even if asleep, he knows they are not committing any sort of deviltry elsewhere.

T. THOMAS FORTUNE, editor of the New Yorlc Globe (known as the "Negro organ"), has in press a small volume devoted to the problems of land and labor and to the social conditions of his own race in the United States. He calls it "Black and White," and takes the ground that the cause of the laboring classes—whatever their color—is one.—John Swinton's Paper.

THE Maori chiefs were taken to St. Paul's Cathedral, in London, Sunday morning, and were so charmed with the sermon that they fell into a deep slumber. All savages, if properly dealt with, reasons Peck's Sun, soon fall into civilized ways, and probably if they would take the Maori chiefs to church regular, they would get their snoring apparatus tuned down so fine that it couldn't be told from that of a Methodist deacon.

THE clergyman who furnished President Pierce with a "character" was the late Rev. Henry Wood, who was rewarded with a consulate to Beyrout, and subsequently a chaplaincy in the navy, after Pierce came to the White House. The romancing nature of the "indorsement," says the Concord Monitor, was only equaled by the alleged subsequent discovery by the author of one of the wheels of Pharaoh's chariot in the Red Sea.

LAND of freedom as it is and has long been, says the New York Herald, Switzerland cannot be congratulated on the satisfactory condition of her laws relativ to religious liberty. The persecution of the Salvationists is matter of recent history. It now appears that not contented with driving the Salvationists out of the country, the authorities are making themselvs obnoxious by attacking all who are suspected of having any sympathy with them and by interfering with prayer-meetings, temperance meetings, and all such. The people, in consequence, hav been thoroughly aroused and a League of Common Right has been formed at Lausanne for the purpose of removing all restrictions to the free exercise of religion and of securing to all citizens the free exercise of their religion. The authorities hav already been approached on the subject, and it is believed that such changes will be made in the laws that persecution for religion's sake will be impossible on Swiss territory.

THE following thoughts suggested by a discussion on Darwinism will be fully appreciated at this particular time of the year: Minks—I don't see why it is that if men originally had tails they didn't stay on. Finks—According to Darwin, the tails dropped off when there was no further use for them. Minks—No further use for them! Good gracious! Did Darwin think that? Finks—Certainly. Minks—Well, I guess he never saw a bald-headed printer setting type in fly time.

A LITTLE girl came from her Sunday-school in a high state of indignation because her Sunday-school teacher had told her that Jesus was a Jew. "Was he a Jew, mother?" "Why, yes, my dear," said the mother, a little doubtfully, as if unwilling to concede the objectionable fact, but unable to deny it; "I suppose he was a Jew." "But I thought he was the son of God." "So he is, my dear." "I don't see how, then, he could be a Jew," responded the young sectarian, "for God is a Presbyterian."—Christian Union.

THE State Department at Washington denies the report that the American minister at Rome has been instructed to act in concert with the ministers of England, Austria, and Spain to obtain from Signor Mancini, the Italian minister of foreign affairs, a mitigation of the decision of the Court of Cassation in regard to the properties of the Propaganda. The secretary of state says that he has the subject under consideration to see if the United States has any right to act in the matter, but has as yet reached no conclusion.

SAM KALLETON, a member of the Arkansas legislature, was very fond of offering amendments to bills introduced. That was the limit of his legislativ capacity. One morning, after a night's hilarity, he entered the legislativ hall just as the chaplain was asking divine aid. The old man took a chew of tobacco and listened attentivly until the chaplain closed his petition with an effectiv recitation of the Lord's Prayer. "Mr. Speaker," said the old man, arising, "I move to strike out the words 'daily bread' and insert 'as much bread as may be found necessary for twenty days.' We hav already done enough for the flood sufferers."

THE clergy in the west of England were formerly devoted to whist. About the beginning of the century there was a whist club in a country town of Somersetshire, composed mostly of clergymen, that met every Sunday evening in the back parlor of a barber's. Four of these were acting as pall bearers at the funeral of a reverend brother, when a delay occurred from the grave not being ready, and the coffin was put down in the chancel. By way of whiling away the time, one of them produced a pack of cards from his pocket and proposed a rubber. When the sexton came to announce that the preparations were complete, he found them deep in their game, using the coffin as their table.

THE platform of the American Prohibition Anti-Masonic Convention, adopted at Chicago, declares that the God of the Christian scriptures is the author of civil government; favors the use of the Bible in the schools; asserts that God requires and man needs the Sabbath; demands strict prohibition laws, the withdrawal of all charters to secret lodges, and that their oaths be prohibited by law; opposes prison and imported contract labor; pledges the party to vote for woman suffrage; asserts that the civil equality granted by the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth amendments should be extended to Indians and Chinamen, that land and other monopolies should be discouraged, that the government should furnish a sound currency, that the tariff should be reduced, and that polygamy should at once be suppressed. S. C. Pomeroy, of Kansas, Gov. St. John of the same state, and the Rev. J. Blanchard, of Illinois, were named for president of the United States. Of the 77 votes cast, Mr. Pomeroy received 72, and his nomination was made unanimous. For vice-president, J. A. Conant, of Connecticut, was nominated by acclamation. A pleasing reflection in regard to these nominations is that the candidates cannot by any possibility be elected.

A DISSCUSSION of what is called telepathy is opened by the Nineteenth Century. The word means feeling at a distance the impulse of another mind through channels as yet unrecognized. There are two forms which telepathic phenomena are held to assume. One is that of simple thought transference, or mind reading, under the control of scientific experiment. In a mesmeric or hypnotic condition, and, indeed, without it, experiments are held to hav shown that impressions or ideas can easily be transferred from one mind to another by an act of will. The second form is that of a sudden, unexpected impression passing from one mind to another, as a sort of presentiment or apparition. The writers treat not at all of apparitions of the dead, but only of the living.

A NEW danger has been discovered in sanitary organization. The ubiquitous bacterium, which proves to be the germ of so many obscure diseases, has been found by M. Parize, a French savant, to take up its abode in brick walls. Noticing some peculiar mark on the outside of the wall, he scraped a little off and placed it under a magnifying power of three hundred; the result of which was to show myriads of organisms moving about with extraordinary activity. It was the more singular that this red dust had been covered with a layer of lime a quarter of an inch thick. Under the impression that the bacteria might hav been a superficial deposit, M. Parize then drilled a hole into the very center of the brick, and to his great surprise discovered that the powdered material was full of the same living organisms, although not in such large quantities as in the external layer. To make sure that this was not an exceptional brick, he carried on his experiments at various places in the walls, and always with the same result, that the bricks were more or less impregnated with bacteria, which appear to flourish equally well in a brick wall as in a saucer of some fermenting substance. There can be very little doubt that woodwork is often a source of danger from the same cause, a perplexing malarious fever having been traced by the doctors of San Francisco to certain decayed foundations and wood floors, which abound in that city, and which, when taken down, were found to be swarming with organisms.

AN engineer on one of the ocean steamers that ply between this port and Liverpool dropped into THE TRUTH SEEKER office recently to supply himself with reading matter for the leisure hours of his next trip across the Atlantic. He showed himself to be full of anecdote and rare humor such as characterizes the seafaring man. In the course of conversation he related the following: The weather was rough one day, and the ship was tossing wildly about. A parson who was on board approached the captain in a state of considerable trepidation and inquired if there was any danger. He knew that he was in the hollow of the almighty hand, but realized that the said hollow contained moisture enough to drown him. The captain referred him to the crew. The preacher worked his way to the forecastle and found the occupants swearing at the weather with an emphasis that nearly paralyzed him. He returned to the captain, and reported that the danger must be great, as the men were blaspheming horribly. The captain hastened to reassure him. Said he: "If the crew are swearing, it is all right; but when those fellows begin to pray you can put on your life-preserver." The preacher went off again, filled with new and serious reflections. Our informant related further that his ship was a favorit one with ministerial tourists. On shipboard they conduct themselvs much like other male passengers, being invariably on hand when the grog goes around, and particularly assiduous in their devotion to female beauty. They straighten up on Sundays, he said, and read off the service at the head of the table.

D. M. Bennett.

Dedication of the Monument.

Exercises in honor of the completion of the Bennett Monument, and by way of dedicating the structure, were held at the German Masonic Temple, 220 East Fifteenth st., New York, on the evening of Friday, June 13th. The platform was adorned with floral decorations, and American flags were draped about a colored lithograph of the monument. A fine audience had gathered when, at a little past 8 o'clock, Mr. Samuel P. Putnam called the meeting to order, and introduced Miss Adelina Peters, who executed a solo upon the piano so acceptably that she was unanimously recalled.

Daniel Edward Ryan, chairman of the Monument Committee, whom Mr. Putnam spoke of as one who had come out into Liberalism through reading D. M. Bennett's writings, read the following report and address:

DEAR FRIENDS: The Bennett Monument Committee, of which I hav the honor of being chairman, has completed the work for which it was appointed, and I hav the pleasure of announcing to you that this meeting has been called for the purpose of presenting and dedicating the fruits of our mission to the Liberals of the world, and the grand principles they represent.

In the sacred name of Liberty, in the higher one of Humanity, this Committee presents you with a noble and complete monument, reared to commemorate and perpetuate the splendid life of one of "nature's noblemen," the path-finder of mental liberty, the great Truth Seeker, D. M. Bennett.

There has been no halt, no lingering doubts and uncertainties, about the final success of this tribute of love and admiration; there has been no thought that the virtues, the kind heart, the genius and the patriotism that inspired as true a man as ever lived in any age should fail of fitting and enduring recognition from his friends; and now we, the men and women who knew him in life as friend or acquaintance, hav laid over his loving heart the responsiv tribute of our own, in the form of a beautiful monument bearing on its sides his grand sentiments, his imperishable principles, which bid all humanity hope, aye, and believe, that heaven is to be the work of human hearts and hands, and "this old world of ours" its location.

It is our proud privilege, in rearing this monument, to hav made secure the truth of history as to the life and death of D. M. Bennett. Standing on the gateway of our country, on a commanding eminence in one of our most beautiful cemeteries, voicing our personal knowledge of the man, in enduring stone, we hav written for all time to come the verdict that his life was that of a patriot and a good man, and his death true to the principles he advocated, and to Nature.

In doing this, we challenge the poisoned fang of Christian hypocrisy, the lying tongue of orthodox slander, the bloody hand of the church, to touch our noble dead. "One thousand friends" hav made it impossible.

Here on the bosom of his nativ land which he loved and honored, before the second grass was green above his grave, his friends hav raised a "beacon" on which the light of imperishable truth stands blazoned out as a guide and a comfort to those timid and halting ones who may gather courage from the fearless example of the dead lion, and it stands there as an evidence that a man can be a prophet with honor in his own country.

There has been no pretense on the part of the committee to build a great monument. Such was not its purpose; the time is to come for that. As it is, it stands in Mr. Bennett's generation, the fitting expression of the love and respect of his friends, and it is their final verdict on his virtues and deeds.

It remains for future generations to render the justice of a great monument to the memory of D. M. Bennett; be it a statue, a noble shaft, a grand institution of learning, or a temple of liberty in the form of a great public hall. When the heritage of his great work has increased his thousand friends into millions, then on this foundation of facts and honor which we hav placed for them, let them build anew.

During the progress of our work, many hav suggested that the monument fund be used for other purposes than a monument of the usual form, to all of which respectful attention was given; but having in view the pit of slander, lies, and disgrace into which the Christian church has cast many noble names, notably those of Voltaire and Paine, it was the sacred duty of Mr. Bennett's friends to make it impossible for saints in or out of the church, be their breed ancient or modern, to say that in any one of the virtues he was not as good as any Christian of his day. We hav made it impossible to bring to proof any charge that our hero and martyr lived any life but such a one as all humanity should be grateful for and Liberals proud of.

Our monument, reared as it were out of the hearts of his friends, stands to-day to giv welcome greeting to the coming of the giant monument to be raised to civil liberty; and while Bartholdi's "Light of Liberty" turns the waters of our beautiful bay into flashing waves of gold, to commemorate one infant step in human progress, ours is to shed the light of "Universal Mental Liberty" on every step that leads to perfect freedom.

With this much for the monument, I turn to the man whose life it is to commemorate; and here I halt, for I hav but little gift of tongue or pen to do justice to the good work of D. M. Bennett. I leave it for the orators of this occasion to do justice to his grand principles, his untiring efforts in battling for the rights of Humanity, his self-sacrifice in daring the power of wrong, his final triumph and vindication, his richly deserved popularity, and his all too early and unexpected death; to all these shining lights of a noble career they will no doubt pay the fitting tribute of oratory and poetry, but with me it must and can only be the plain expression of respect and affection.

This good, unassuming, and honest man affected my life mightily and moved my heart to love him. Now is the proper time to weave loving words into unfading wreats to lay upon his grave. Mine may not be the fairest or the sweetest; but I offer them as I would were it to the memory of my own father.

The fact that I am a Liberal and an Infidel, I may safely say, is owing in a great measure to my first acquaintance with Mr. Bennett and the study I gave his character. The great truth-finder released the last bit of a mortgage that Christian superstition held on my brain through the logic of his facts, based on nature and nature's laws. His profound and exhaustiv presentation of nature, coupled with the goodness of his own life, the hight and breadth of his manhood, the splendor of his Humanity, his self-sacrificing spirit in the cause of Liberalism, and his genuin patriotism, all stamped him as a son of God ("revised edition," by the Liberal standard) and a worthy exemplar for me.

In throwing off the chains of the church I reasoned it out thus: If men like Bennett go to hell, there will be very little brains and honesty in heaven. Again, there are so many grand men and women in the world whose genius and intellect dominate it, whose honesty and Infidelity are known of all men, who will go to the same Christian "hot-box" for like reasons, that the chances are in favor of hades being the most desirable summer resort; and if Bennett can stand it, so can I.

In the light of my freedom as I now enjoy it, standing before a real or imaginary God and facing my sins on my own responsibility, and not throwing them in a cowardly manner on an apostate Jew dead near unto two thousand years; I say that if saints are needed to intercede for sinners, and I am to be considered as one, I propose to accept as a saint a man of whose uprightness of life I hav full knowledge, and that man is D. M. Bennett, whom I appoint to the court of St. Peter in my behalf. Contrast his life, brimming with kindness, to the ex-murderers, the ex-human butchers, torturers, inquisitors, plunderers, incendiaries, perjurers, and other devils, who in the name of Christ hav desolated the earth for centuries, canonized saints by the canons of the church instead of the canons of the oppressed, and see how such a life as Bennett's hangs as a glorious star in a cloudless sky as compared to such tallow dips.

It was my privilege to know Mr. Bennett in close friendship, and to a limited extent as an adviser. I was drawn into closer relations with him when he was beset by the great American procurer of crime, Anthony Comstock. In then explaining to me his reasons for throwing down the gage of defiance to the United States government as represented by its human tools and villainous laws, I saw the grandeur of Mr. Bennett's character as a man, an American, and a patriot. For he said the obscenity laws are a disguise which, while passed seemingly in and for the interest of morality and purity, are intended to be used in the interest of the Christian church, eventually to crush out Liberal books and papers and Infidelity by working up eventually that all such books and principles were immoral.

He said some one must suffer by publicly defying the law and breaking it, and having the case made as public as possible. His argument from a patriotic standpoint was, if in the growth of corrupt and unjust laws, they are not resisted we finally become enslaved; and the prompt resistance to bad laws either causes their repeal, or revolution. It was corrupt and oppressiv laws that gave us such "traitors" as Washington and American liberty.

In view of the fact that there was no justice to be had without a fight for it, he proposed to fight, and fight he did, not for his own right, not for his own interests, but for those of another whom he felt it to be his duty as a citizen to fight for; not that he believed in the principle of the other's work (in fact, he opposed it), but he did believe in and fought for his weaker brother's right to enjoy the constitutional right of free speech, free press, and free mails, and that this morally bankrupt government had no right to set itself up as a moral censor.

In conclusion I will add that I enjoyed the pleasure of being the first man to grasp his honest hand as he came out of the Albany Penitentiary. I had the honor of being the silent and very happy chairman of the committee of reception, that tendered him a public ovation at Chickering Hall, and what a glorious Liberal earthquake it was for the grand old man's Christian enemies! How it struck into the vitals of orthodox bigots, and showed them the boiling, bubbling volcano of Liberal minds on which they were standing, and likely to burst forth at any time, and sweep all over the land. Again, at my residence, his friends gave him a good-bye reception when he was about starting on his tour around the world.

It was a happy occasion, and all felt that the turning-point of his life for many years of joy, comfort, and usefulness was before him. We bade him good-bye, feeling that our country was ennobled by such men being born on its soil, and that liberty was secure while we had such as he to uphold and defend it.

His trip around the world has made humanity richer from his gathered knowledge, and his books on that trip are almost unrivaled in the extent and value of their information. He returned to his nativ land, to proud and loving friends, to his honored and beloved wife and associates. We welcomed him by a public dinner, and made him feel that in real, genuin friendship there is much of heaven, and that he had good and true friends, and many of them. But as his future grew golden with happy promis, the thunder-clap came, and our hero lay dead. When all seemed to center in him that rendered his life and services invaluable to our cause, he lay down and died.

The night of his funeral, we took upon ourselvs the trust to erect a monument to his memory, and in asking the discharge of this committee, I will say that the gradual and insidious growth of power and corruption in all branches of our government, the dead conscience of Christianity, the slavish fear of the law by the masses, the insane desire for wealth, the growth of monopoly, the centralization of power, the perversion of constitutions and laws as against popular liberty, all threaten its speedy downfall. But I say to you that while there are men and women left who build monuments to worth, to devotion, to humanity, to patriotism, to self-sacrifice, then liberty will eventually triumph. It is safe. The race of moral heroes like D. M. Bennett can never die out while the golden steps that lead up to the citadel of liberty are guarded by the great minds of each generation.

The following song, adapted from Adelaide Proctor's "The Lost Chord," was sung by Mrs. McCune:

Behold life's infinit wonder.
Though the darkness of death may come,
Though its shadows ever tremble
Over the bluest dome,

We know not what is in living,
Or what we in dying gain,
But we strike one chord of music,
Like the sound of a great amen.

It floodeth our onward journey
Like the thrill of a noble psalm,
And it touches the struggling spirit
With a sense of infinit calm.

It quieteth pain and sorrow
Like love overcoming strife;
It seems the harmonious echo
From our discordant life.

It links all perplexed meanings
Into one perfect peace,
And trembles away into silence
As if it were loth to cease.

We hav sought, but we seek not vainly,
This one great chord sublime,
That leaps from the soul of the living,
And blends with deathless time.

Not upward, but onward, bright angels,
Will fill the to-morrow's ken,
And the dead shall still shine in glory,
Still they speak life's grand amen.

During the singing of this song, rendered in a clear contralto voice, the listeners could hardly restrain their applause, and at the close Mrs. McCune received quite an ovation.

This memorial poem was read by Mr. Putnam:

'Twas spring's first jewel in the golden year,
Day, rich with promis and with present joy,
Decking the earth with beauty, and the sky
With thousand signals of resplendent hope.
'Twas nature's festival, and all its light
Seemed bursting forth in grass and leaf and flower;
The voice of birds poured trembling with delight;
The clouds but veiled the blue to softer fire,
And touched the face of heaven with brighter smiles;
The heart was jubilant—care fled away—
And the sharp pains that pierce the struggling mind
Trying to solve the problem of vast life,
Of good and evil mingled in the web
Of shifting worlds upon the maze of time.
All now seemed good, all beautiful, deep bathed
In the effulgence of fulfilled desire.
On such a day, when life's supremest rose
Was blooming like a crown to every path,
I went with eager step, with glowing mind,
To view the gleaming City of the Dead,
Flooded with life on this sweet gala day;
Afar the sea with circling jewels flashed
Along the quivering radiance of the sky;
The charm of all things lovely filled the air,
And seemed to draw from out the heart of earth
The flaming wreath of everlasting hope.
While on the vision of the inward self
Burst the far wonder of what death might be,
A sea of joy in life's immensity,
Sweeping to golden shores of loftier birth.
I stood beside the gracious gift—the granit shaft—
The crystal memory of a thousand hearts
To him who fought when Freedom's banner trailed,
Who lifted it from out the dust, and flung its folds
To greet the morning of the world's new day.
My soul was thrilled beside that buried corse—
It was not buried and it was not dead;
I felt its life within my throbbing brain,
I felt the touch of an immortal power,
I felt the endlessness of right and truth;
That manhood cannot perish—'tis a star
Shining forever in the depths of time,
And death but makes more beautiful its orb,
Veiling with mystic grace its quenchless fire.
I felt the hero living 'neath the mound,
The martyr's soul still burning like the sun,
Illuminating, kindling, till my thought
Went forth in energy unconquerable.
Life grew to wondrous meaning and delight;
Work was not valueless, nor high desire;
Nor that which labors for to-morrow's weal;
Nor the ideal splendor of the soul;
Nor any feeling for the good and true;
Nor any effort of the struggling flesh;
Nor any dream of beauty or of joy;
Nor any thrill of the ecstatic mind.
Still flows sublimest effluence to each deed,
Undying in the gathering stream of time,
Still makes for truth, for virtue, and for love.
Thus in fair memory this toiler livs;
Sincere and brave he was—Nature's bold child—
Rugged, like oak, yet kindly, graced with flowers
Of beautiful feeling—stern student of the real—
Unflinchingly he faced the naked truth,
Yet reveled in the joy of noblest dreams.
Peaceful he was and sought the radiant calm
Of science, and the hights of foremost thought—
Yet, when the conflict deepened and the stab
Of subtle foes was made at Freedom's breast,
Quick was he to the front and met the blow,
And falling in defeat won noblest crown
And seated Freedom on a fairer hight,
And made her promis richer to the world.
From prison bars he walked to ampler life;
Yet, deep within, the savage chain was felt,
And its dark fruit was death, surcease of all,
The body buried in the voiceless sod;
But fame is his, sweet as the summer's breath;
He is a living thought within our minds,
A memory and a glory—to the world
This gift shall bear his name to deathless light,
Freighted with precious words—his clearest thought—
Speaking to millions through the shining days,
Making man's hope more beautiful, his death more grand,
Life more beneficent, its toil more high,
And joy more regnant in each humble task.

After a song by Mr. Edward Boys, Mrs A. C. Macdonald said:

In inviting the general Liberal public to join with us in the ceremonies of formally dedicating to the purpose for which it was intended the monument erected to the memory of our martyr-hero, D. M. Bennett, it seems to me that it is not only appropriate, but that it is incumbent upon those who had the privilege and the honor of knowing the character and the characteristics that placed Mr. Bennett so prominently before the public, and entitled him to be so remembered, to tell to others, to that public, just what those characteristics were. When I was invited to speak on this occasion, my first thought was that I would treat of the relations of the great secular or Liberal movement—in which Mr. Bennett was so deeply engaged—to the cause of my own sex, the enfranchisment of woman. It is a well-known fact that a great many people who hold, from principle, to the right of woman to take part in political affairs, when they look at the superior devotion of woman to the church, yet hesitate to giv her the privilege of the franchise, for fear that the first effect would be to vote "God into the Constitution." And there certainly is some show of reason for this fear. So I wished to point out to woman what to my mind is perfectly clear, that the work of such men as Mr. Bennett is even more in her behalf than in that of her lord and master. But when I came to reflect how few comparativly had the privilege of knowing D. M. Bennett as I did, and, in fact, when I remembered what an almost incomparable opportunity I had of really and truly knowing him, I felt it was my duty to record some of the reminiscences of our long and intimate acquaintance, and relate some of the impressions which his personality made upon me.

On the removal of THE TRUTH SEEKER from Paris, Illinois, in December, 1872, where it had been published as a monthly four times only, the little babe in swaddling-clothes found a cradle and a home, and, I might almost say, a mother's care, in a little office at 335 Broadway, which I had rented for my eldest son, now editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, then a boy of eighteen. A few weeks previous my son had come once more to New York to engage in his calling as compositor. From that time to Mr. Bennett's untimely death, when I also had the privilege of watching the final struggle of expiring nature, and of closing his eyes as he sank into "that sleep that knows no earthly waking," I was in more or less intimate communication with him; my son, as doubtless many of you are aware, working in his office in various capacities, as type-setter. proof-reader, foreman, etc.; and myself, after working with him, sitting beside him at his editorial table for a number of months, being in almost uninterrupted communication with him, sharing his confidence, sympathizing with him, always believing in him and encouraging him what little lay in my power; and so I propose to record, as I said, some of the reminiscences and relate some of the impressions I derived from my close acquaintance with him.

Did I believe in a "special providence," as I once did, I should hav firmest faith that that special providence directed and controled a course of events that has finally drifted affairs where they are to-day. Our good orthodox friends would dwell, I think, with considerable gusto upon the fact of a very wise and good providence, which, seemingly, has so led the two parties—one the simple, childlike, even to boyishness; great-hearted, unselfish, genial, energetic, resolute, determined almost to obstinacy; the persevering, honest, earnest founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the Yankee country boy, now its editor—into each other's company.

A few weeks after my son's arrival in New York, in the fall of 1871, I took for him, he being too young to do the business, the little office I hav already spoken of, at 335 Broadway, where THE TRUTH SEEKER subsequently found its home.

During the previous summer, at a little meeting at 200 Third avenue, instituted by that veteran enthusiast, Mr. Schwackhammer, especially for Mr. Andrews, I had become acquainted with Mr. Morris Altman, a brother of Altman & Co., on Sixth avenue, a converted Jew—converted to Infidelity—and it was through Mr. Altman that Mr. Bennett was introduced to Eugene in his little office, and THE TRUTH SEEKER found lodgment where it did in New York. Mr. Altman seemed to think that an office conducted by my son would be a fitting place for the issuing of a Freethought newspaper. And so it has proved. From that time forward I was more or less in communication with Mr. Bennett, always in sympathy with him and his work, and always believed in him. Perhaps, at times, I might hav wavered in my faith in him had it not been for the months I sat beside him at his little table, and witnessed the thorough honesty of the man, the thorough earnestness and devotion of his work. I might include, did time permit, in this special providence, some of the working of events which brought my other son, George E. Macdonald, to New York, and into THE TRUTH SEEKER office. He came at seventeen years of age, entered the office, and learned to set type, worked his way up through different grades—as errand boy, type-setter, proofreader, foreman, etc., etc. Although his name does not appear, he is really an assistant editor. He is, as many of you are aware, the reporter of the Liberal Club meetings, and the writer of many humorous and poetical contributions.

Probably to my dying day I shall not forget my first meeting with Mr. Bennett. To at all appreciate the relief I felt at the sight of his benovolent face on that occasion, you would hav to understand the state of anxiety I was in. I had taken the office as a job office, as I hav said. Mr. Altman and others thought and said that we ought to print Mr. Bennett's paper, but there was no newspaper type in the office, and I had no means of getting any. Mr. Bennett might hav started a paper to liv, or he might hav started one to die, as in a thousand other cases papers hav been started only to die a few months old. Mr. Bennett might be a rascal, or he might be an honest and honorable man, and even then the paper be a failure. But he had got into the office, my son had run his credit for type, and had gone to work on the January number. I was at work in a printing office in Park Row, and on my way home one evening called to see him. As I entered the room, there beside the stove sat an elderly man in the garb of a downeast or western farmer, the farthest looking from a literary man possible. Unblackened shoes, unkempt hair, unshaven face, a farmer, not an editor, any one would say. Eugene stepped forward and introduced us. One glance at his kindly, genial face, which so plainly spoke the nativ goodness of the man, and a load was lifted from my heart. The first thought that entered my mind was: My boy has found a father; and so it proved. From that day till the day of Mr. Bennett's death, the two stood in the relation of father and son to each other, or rather it were nearer true to say of an elder and a younger brother.

The quality in Mr. Bennett's character which impressed itself most forcibly upon me was his unimpeachable honesty. By this, I do not mean merely honesty in dealing; I mean something far more than that. A man might be as honest as honesty itself in his commerce with others, but still not possess one particle of this trait, so prominent to me in his character. I mean that unswerving fidelity to his own convictions which prompted him to be ever true to himself. He always said what he meant, and meant what he said. He uttered what he believed, and believed what he uttered. He was never ashamed of his convictions. They were so palpable to him that he entertained them as a matter of course, so that the idea of shrinking from the utterance of them never entered his mind. It was not anything that he had reasoned himself into; but was nativ to his character. And this was the case with all his traits. They were part and parcel of his very nature—"nativ and to the manner born." Like Topsy, "he growed." He was never converted, for he had no need of it to make him just what he was. He was an eminent example of "the man of the future," of whom Beecher spoke, of those who are so well-born that they do not need to be born again. And so of his unselfishness or altruism. That was another of his most prominent traits. His heart and his pocket were always open. I know whereof I speak. He never refused to help another for the sake of keeping a dollar in his own pocket.

Mr. Bennett was a deeply religious man. I mean this in no canty sense, but in the deepest, truest, aye, in THE TRUE sense of the word; for talk and think as we will of the meaning of the WORD religion, that element in human nature which constitutes religion per se—which underlies or pervades all systems of religion, and makes their religion, whatever creed or form they assume—is "devotion to the highest." Thomas Paine said, "To do good is my religion." Now, it was because that was the highest work that he could do, that made it his religion.

The word religion—and there is a vast difference between the THING itself and the word or term which we use to designate that thing—the word "religion" may mean, etymologically or otherwise, anything that it is demonstrated to mean, but that does not affect the thing itself of which I am speaking, that element in our nature which we call religion. The word may mean "to tie back," or "to tie together;" the thing itself, I repeat, is "devotion to the highest." If to "tie" or unite "together" is the the highest work that we can do, then that is our religious work; and the measure of our devotion to that work is the measure of our religion; but just now the Liberals, it seems to me, are engaged in taking apart, tearing down, rooting up generally. If they are doing this iconoclastic work because they see that it is necessary to be done, and it is the highest work that they can do, then it is their religious work, just as truly religious as worshiping God or saving souls. True, you may say that this tearing down is preparatory work—preparatory to ulterior building; that the separating is preparatory to uniting on a higher plane; that the analyzing, as it were, or freeing mankind is in order to "tie again" in a true and harmonious oneness. Granted all this, but then the work is not religious because it involves the tying together process, but because it is devotion to the highest. The Hindoo mother considered it her highest to throw her babe into the Ganges; the Hindoo widow her highest to lay herself on her husband's funeral pile; the Christian's highest is to honor and glorify God.

It is in this sense that Mr. Bennett was a religious man; and if we measure his religion by the measure of his devotion to his work, he was a deeply religious man.

The work which he did was the very highest, in his estimation, which he could do, almost which there was to be done, and his whole heart, his whole soul, was in that work. He thought of it by day, and he dreamed of it by night, or rather his life was the merest alternation between working on and for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and sleeping Other duties he accepted as a necessity, but they were secondary and subsidiary; but, as I said, he alternated between work on his paper and sleep, giving regularly but three or four hours—from 11 or 12 o'clock to 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning—to sleep, taking the remainder of his rest in his chair at his office table, in cat-naps, as they are called. He would drop off for a minute or two in the middle of an article he was writing, or in the middle of a sentence, awaking refreshed, and taking up his pen again seemingly unconscious that he had been asleep at all.

Just look at the immense work he did in the few short years after he came to New York—his "Champions of the Church," his "World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," his almost interminable letters from Ludlow street and Albany, his "Truth Seeker Around the World," an amount of work that no one man could accomplish unless he made that work his religious work. Hence I say he was a deeply, a devotedly religious man.

Then, again, sentences were continually dropping from his lips which would show to one, even though one did not know the habit of his life, where his heart was. One I remember, and will repeat because it showed not only that THE TRUTH SEEKER was first and foremost ever, but that he thus early appreciated at its true worth the literary ability of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S subsequent and present editor, and also that he already at that early date had in his mind the consideration of what was to become of the offspring of his own brain and heart.

It was in the early days of the National Liberal League, just after we had obtained a charter for the Fourth New York, now the Bennett Liberal League. He and I were going together up to the meeting of that League, to take place in the parlors of our good Brother Ryan. I called his attention to an article just published in the Boston Investigator from the pen of the then young literary aspirant, E. M. Macdonald. I asked him if he did not consider the article "pretty good." "Excellent, excellent," he replied, and added, "I tell you my mantle will fall on worthy shoulders." Alas, how little did we think it would fall so soon!

I might speak of his other traits of character more in detail, of his peculiarly easy style of writing, which enabled him so successfully to appeal to the masses, etc., etc., but I hav already exceeded my time.

Just two weeks before he passed to another life (as he and I believed), I saw him conscious for the last time. He was working at his desk, but disease had already made and was making sad inroads upon his frame, and he was already aware what the result would probably be. Turning to me, after telling me how badly he was feeling, he said, "I tell you that unless they do something for me, Bennett is simply going out." Two weeks later, as I said, we watched his life "go out;" but his light—never! When even this granit monument which we dedicate here to-night shall hav crumbled into dust, the light which he kindled when he started that little paper in Paris, Ill., will shine on and on; and as founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER his name will liv while mankind love liberty, and men honor the memory of our heroic dead.

Mr. Andrews spoke as follows:

When I was invited to speak on this occasion, I first had it in mind to find the most leading trait or traits in the character of Mr. Bennett, and to take them as texts for what I had to say. But on reflection, it seemed to me that his character was so exceedingly round and simple that a stroke of genius was requisit in order to see how to carry out that program. Thinking of the matter further, and learning what Mrs. Macdonald was expected to do here, on this occasion, I hav thought that it would be more agreeable, and a better use of the time, for me to back her up with a series of reminiscences in relation to Mr. Bennett.

When Mr. Bennett came to this city, he came directly to my house; and for the first ten days or two weeks he made my headquarters his headquarters—not that he lived exactly with me, but that he came there and did his writing, and made it the center of his operations while he investigated the city and the possibilities of his doing something here. During that period I had constant intercourse with him, and an opportunity to learn of him and his character.

I think I shall hav to diverge a moment, and ask you to excuse me for saying something in relation to myself and my past history earlier than that day, but which seems to stand so related with this subject that it will not be, I hope, found inappropriate. The question arises, perhaps, in your minds, why did Mr. Bennett come to me? Well, the only reason was that for thirty-five or forty years past in New York, I hav been, in a certain sense, a sort of rallying-point for the radicals and enthusiasts, and cranky people of all sorts; that my house, which has sometimes, through poverty, been reduced very nearly to a garret, and sometimes, through prosperity, surrounded with comfort, verging on luxury—my house has always been a sort of cross between a hotel and a university; and, somehow or other, I hav been known not only in this country, but abroad, so that pretty much everybody of the so-called cranky type that arrived in New York found out where Stephen Pearl Andrews lived, and generally reported pretty early. In fact, it would be a very curious history to know what has occurred of this kind. The persons who are known before the world as reformers hav, a very large proportion of them, passed through my school, and hav often actually resided with me, from two or three days to two or three years; and in that way a certain centering influence has gone out which made others know with regard to there being such a center of curious folks; so that when they came to New York, as I said, they were very apt to find me.

Mr. Bennett came to me. He brought me no letters of introduction, because he sensed the fact that no letters of introduction were requisit—that every earnest seeker, every earnest worker, every enthusiast in behalf of the improvement of human condition, was always welcome. I think Mr. Bennett had only one otber friend here. I had not been his friend, knowingly. I knew nothing of him till he arrived, although he knew of me. He had a friend in the city, who was Mr. Morris Altman. I think he had had some correspondence with him; but he came to me first, as I remember his inquiring how he was to find Mr. Altman. Mr. Altman and he became very intimate and loving friends, and Mr. Altman's subsequent death was one of the greatest strokes of ill-fortune that ever occurred to Mr. Bennett. During these two weeks that Mr. Bennett and myself were thus thrown very intimately together, I had, as I said, the opportunity of knowing him. But I don't think I came to know him. I regarded him as one of a group of devoted, and enthusiastic, and good men, who wished to do something, and hoped they could do something, and were determined to do something; but I didn't read his character as it was developed subsequently in the light of circumstances. My spiritual sight wasn't sufficiently open to see in that plain countryman the qualities that made D. M. Bennett what he proved to be subsequently; and while he consulted me, while he told me what he came here for, and what he intended to do, I think I said quite as much to discourage him as to encourage him. I painted the difficulties. I had known of hundreds of instances of similar earnest and honest efforts to start this and that and the other enterprise in behalf of reform, almost all of which had sunk into nonentity; and I didn't sense in Mr. Bennett any special power that was going to make him the exception. I had to learn subsequently, by experience, what, if I had had more intuition, I might hav known then.

At that time I was engaged in giving a series of Sunday lectures, which I called "Scientific Sermons," the De Garmo Hall series, which Mrs. Macdonald has adverted to, and which lasted something more than a year. Mr. Bennett continued to attend very frequently, though not always, upon my ministrations upon those occasions; and he became, as he told me, subsequently and often, profoundly interested in the idea of Alwato, the universal language; although he was not a linguist, and didn't propose charging himself with anything about it personally, yet the idea became a dominant one with him for the remainder of his life.

The next thing that dwells in my memory, with regard to Mr. Bennett, is one which, curiously enough, I find Mrs. Macdonald has almost entirely forgotten, although she was one of the parties immediately concerned in it. I think it was while they were still in that little primitiv office in Moffatt's Building on Broadway. Mr. Bennett fell, in the midst of his labors, from his chair on to the floor, as if dead, and Mrs. Macdonald came to his relief, and called in others, and he was lifted on to his seat; and went home; and probably rested for a few hours; and then went to his work again. Now, it has been said that he was persecuted, and taken to prison, and that in consequence of that persecution he was broken down in health, and was a martyr, in that sense, to his persecution. I doubt that fact very much. I believe that Mr. Bennett unconsciously, thoughtlessly, murdered himself; just as hundreds and thousands of our highest, and best, and noblest personages are doing, by overwork, by this continuous, uninterrupted, unmitigated labor that you hav heard described here to-night; with no knowledge of physiological law, or no obedience to it, if known; and with utter indifference to results, except immediate success in what is in hand.

I do not mean that all that was not necessary; but I mean that it was a fact. Just in the same manner, it has been said, for example, of Horace Greeley, that he was killed by his last political campaign, when he was candidate for the presidency. I know better. Two months before he entered into that campaign at all, I being at the rooms of a mutual friend of his and mine, in the Astor House, Mr. Greeley came in there, and said he wanted to lie down on the sofa. He did so, and as he lay on the sofa he fainted; and I remained there four hours over him, laboring to recover him and bring him to, and make him recognize those about him; and he wouldn't allow us to send—he knew enough to object very obstinately to having a physician called. He finally recovered, and, I suppose, didn't giv himself half an hour of time to rest, but went right back to his work as before. Horace Greeley killed himself; and he was virtually a dead man before he went into that campaign at all.

The second great occasion upon which I came in any special contact with, any close relation to, Mr. Bennett (although we continued always to hav friendly intercourse) was the day before he took his departure for his tour around the world. On that occasion he came to see me, and told me that for that day, almost the first time in his life, he was at leisure. He said he had all his preparations made for sailing, and that he hadn't another thing to do, and that he had taken the opportunity to come and make me a visit; and he remained two or three hours, and seemed loth to go.

There were apparently two or three purposes that he had in his mind, one of which was to tell me how much he really and sincerely and deeply appreciated the kind of works that I am engaged in; and with regard to Universology, that he believed in it, because I believed in it, but that he didn't understand it—didn't profess to.

His second purpose was apologetic. During the whole period of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S existence, up to that time, I had appeared in the paper very little indeed. I had tendered several long papers—not longer than Mr. Bennett's own—and he always found them inappropriate, and crowded them out; but during the year or two previous to this Mr. Wakeman had appeared very largely in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and had produced his magnificent series of papers upon Constructiv Socialism. Mr. Bennett's main purpose, then, seemed to me to be apologetic. He wanted to tell me why it was that he had never done more for the promulgation of my peculiar thought. He said: "I am full of ideas of my own that I hav been wanting to get out, and that was the first thing with me. We," explaining that he meant himself and his readers—"we are a plain people. We understand common language and common ideas, and we don't understand much else. Mr. Wakeman is just all we can stand. I don't more than half understand Mr. Wakeman; and of my readers, I presume, not one in a hundred understands him as well as I do, and," said he, "if I see right, you puzzle and bother Wakeman about as much as we are puzzled and bothered by him. Now," he added, "your time will hav to come later. I am, I think, just about on a level with the people, and Wakeman is a good ways away from the people; and you are a good ways away from Wakeman; and so I hav not found the opportunity to do much for your thought. But the time will come; don't you worry; you will be heard from, and it will be all right." That was his second purpose.

His third purpose, in his long visit, was apparently to talk freely about his own affairs, and his hopes, and his future journey, and his future purposes in the world, when he should return. I cannot take the time to go over the ground of all that. A great deal was said very freely between him and me on that occasion, and, as I said, he lingered, and seemed unwilling to go. There was also a sort, as it seemed to me, of foreboding, as though, in a high degree of probability, he should never return—never complete his journey; and there was a tenderness and real heartfelt friendliness manifested toward me, personally, that I had no knowledge of before.

One thing I will mention where I had some influence and effect, probably, upon the destiny of THE TRUTH SEEKER; and that was in connection with the introduction of improved spelling—the modified spelling which is now used in THE TRUTH

SEEKER and in a good many other of the reformatory papers. Mrs. Eliza B. Burns, herself one of my early disciples in that line, and myself were, I think, the sources of influence which induced Mr. Bennett to adopt that reform. He believed in it, but to apply it practically, in the way in which he did, he felt to be a great step which he shrunk from, as possibly calculated to cut down his list of subscribers, and really to be a great sacrifice; and it was a good while that he was thinking about it, and talking about it, before he made up his mind ultimately to take the step. When he did so, I intimated that very likely he would be discouraged. He said, "You needn't hav any trouble about that; if I begin I shall never let go; I don't take any step backward."

A third and last striking point of contact between him and me was just prior to his death. I omit reference to the public matters, such as his reception on his return from prison, and his return from abroad, on both of which occasions I took part; but as to our somewhat more private intercourse and relation, the occasion to which I shall now refer was what I may call the third of the point of contact between us.

The Defense Committee, which you all know about here, had at the time weekly meetings, called up in connection with Mr. Heywood's affairs. I am not a member of that committee, but I hav a standing, and, usually, a special, invitation to be present at these meetings, and to take part in their discussions. Being present about three weeks before Mr. Bennett's death, at a weekly meeting of this Defense Committee, Mr. Bennett opposed the methods of Mr. Heywood, in a way which seemed to me very illogical, and I so said, and an earnest discussion grew up between him and me, which was really excited—almost a quarrel on both sides—in which I charged upon him his want of consistency, the two cases being, as it seemed to me, parallel; and he approving his own course in having defied the public, and disapproving Mr. Heywood's. The bad reasoning that he resorted to on that occasion actually provoked me, and I said some harsh and unpleasant things. The next week—a week after—he came again, dragging himself into the meeting. It was the last public meeting, or meeting of any kind, that he ever attended. The same subject came up again; there was the same perversity in his mode of reasoning, the same disappointment to me in the man; but as I watched him I saw that he was sick—exceedingly sick—and that his brain was not working with its former accuracy; and I suppressed all tendency to reply to him; we all did—deferred to his condition; and the matter ceased to be discussed. On that occasion he said, in very nearly the same words that Mrs. Macdonald has brought to your attention, "If you fellows don't do something for me soon, Bennett is going to die." We inquired about his symptoms and sufferings. He related them, and added that he had "taken all the medicin, of all sorts, that anybody had recommended" to him. Well, I felt a good deal discouraged in prescribing, under those circumstances. I did not know anything that I could do. Dr. Foote, senior, took him in charge. We had great confidence in him, and I did not visit the patient immediately again, and the next thing that I knew, he was in the act of dying.

Those are my reminiscences—my remembrances—with regard to personalities as between Mr. Bennett and myself. I don't know that there is anything that I need to add more than what has been said and implied by the eloquent tributes that hav been made to him here to-night.

Mr. Bennett was an exceedingly rare character, not only for what he was, but for what he did not seem to be. He did not carry about him that which made the impression on others, I think, of the power that was in him; and, consequently, he was never a man that aroused the enthusiastic admiration of cultured people. I think the Boston cultured people felt that he was an insult to their prim, precise, and admirable methods, and I think that few of that cultured class were great enough to be just to the greatness of such a man as Mr. Bennett.

The chairman read this letter from Dr. Foote, whose health did not permit him to be present:

NEW YORK, June 13, 1884.

TO THE FRIENDS WHO DEDICATE: My heart is with you this evening, and I only wish my ears might be also, but for reasons that can hardly interest you I must catch what I can of your enthusiasm and giv the responsiv amens while twenty miles away from the city. This is alone my misfortune, and I greatly regret it.

On a previous occasion I think I intimated that if I understand the tastes and prejudices of Liberals, they do not much take to monuments, whether of bronze or stone. There are individuals eminent in life who would hardly be remembered when dead without monuments, and there are many now occupying positions to be seen of all men who would hardly receive a passing thought a century hence though parks and monuments be lavishly ornamented with their effigies. But our late effectiv co-worker, our ever-to-be-remembered D. M. Bennett, threw huge stones at the enemies of human progress, and in rearing the monument to his name and memory we but gather them and engrave his own immortal thoughts thereon, so that, though dead, our hero yet speaketh. The pen of steel has been transformed into enduring granit which rust can never corrode, and some of his best thoughts are as good as rewritten day by day, while eyes which hav been blinded by superstition gaze upon the massiv block one thousand admiring hands hav raised in Greenwood to mark his resting-place, and to establish a permanent milestone for those who are inquiring the way to the land of mental freedom. Our late brother rests among the Protestant dead, in the great and fashionable burial-place of the Christian Protestants, the greatest Protestant of them all, with a shaft rising above his ashes which must ever remain a standing protest to the Christian Protestants themselvs, as well as to the superstitions of the mother church, with its relics of pagan worship. All who contributed in money or labor to the massiv block of granit now standing as a pillar to Liberalism in Greenwood Cemetery may well feel proud of what has been accomplished.

Though absent, I take you one and all by the hand and congratulate you that the religion of humanity has an established preacher among the throngs who crowd the walks and drives of the most beautiful cemetery on the continent.

Cordially yours, E. B. FOOTE, SR., M.D.

A duet was sung, and Mr. E. W. Chamberlain spoke substantially as follows:

MR. CHAIRMAN AND FRIENDS OF BENNETT: When I was asked to speak this evening, the invitation was coupled with the pat suggestion that, as there were to be a number of speakers, my share of the time would necessarily be brief. I did not, therefore, attempt to reduce my thoughts to writing, as some of the preceding speakers hav done, and my only preparation to speak has been since I came here this evening. I now find myself embarrassed because, as I tried to collect my ideas, interesting reminiscences of Bennett and recollections of my relations with him crowd upon me so tumultuously that I am unable to choose what to present to you, and while, without conceding that any more earnest or devoted friend of Bennett than myself could be chosen to address you, I feel that I am to be followed, as I hav been preceded, by those whose eloquence more fitly adorns this occasion; so, although I might talk to you for hours, I will trespass only a little upon your time while I lay my simple flower upon the grave of the heroic truth seeker, and pay my homely tribute to his memory.

It is right that we should come here to-night with music and flowers, for we hav cause to felicitate ourselvs and humanity that a monument is completed which shall fitly show our esteem for the truth seeker and at the same time perpetuate his thought in the world. But this is not the culmination of our effort, nor the end of our work. This meeting is only one milestone which marks advance in the path of progress, and we must not rest here, but only pause to observe from some hight the whole field over which we hav come, and point out our future course.

The Chickering Hall reception on the liberation of the truth seeker from prison was, as expressed in the resolutions then adopted, "a protest against the obscenity in private life, the corruption in office, the hypocrisy in the pulpit, and the dishonesty on the bench, which hav combined to perpetrate the outrage upon Mr. Bennett." At that time so great a scare was created by the report that Mr. Bennett was convicted of obscenity that the trustees of Cooper Union, where some of the most radical meetings are held, closed its doors to the committee who sought to engage their hall for the Bennett reception. Since then what has happened? Only two months ago the procurer of crime was thoroughly exposed before a legislativ committee in this city, and a number of conscientious and worthy gentlemen united in the opinion that no reliance was to be placed upon him under any circumstances. The knavish priest who so desired the imprisonment of the truth seeker that he sat in court throughout most of the farcical trial has come to be an object of contempt and ridicule and the butt of the funny men of local papers. It is not infrequent to see in the newspapers after his name the descriptiv words, "the liar." That other ecclesiastical busybody who chuckled and exulted over the shameful incarceration has subsided into insignificance. The judge whose infamous decision in the case of Lawrence led to the Winslow Extradition scandal, who connived with the procurer of crime to assail one of the noblest philanthropists that ever lived, and who lent himself to the assassination of the truth seeker, still pollutes the bench, but he has come to be hated and detested for his brutality and vindictivness. The writer who misrepresented our hero and placed him in a false light by his article, "The Apotheosis of Dirt," is dead. Let us forgiv him, for he knew not what he did. The statesman who yielded to the importunities of his meretricious wife and withheld the pardon he should hav hastened to giv to the convict whom he knew was innocent has taken up the more befitting occupation of raising chickens. These men were the enemies of liberty. If what they did to the truth seeker is the outcome of their religion, if their religion sanctions and approves such an outrage as they committed, then I say the world would be better without their religion, and I say, moreover, that the principles of American liberty which were violated by the imprisonment of Bennett are of more valuë to mankind than any religion that ever was devised or concocted.

Contrast the deceitfulness of these men with the truthfulness of Bennett. You remember that he never for one moment flinched from telling the truth, even when the strongest temptation ever spread before any man was offered him to falsify his actions, even when he had every reason to expect that his telling the truth would alienate all his friends whose support and encouragement were so vital to him.

Contrast, I say, the sneaking characters of the men who hav not ceased to malign him with his truthfulness and fortitude. I can imagin the grand old hero crying out from the anguish of his imprisonment even as Latimer cried to Ridley out of the flames of persecution: "Play the man, Master Ridley. We shall this day light a candle in England that will never be extinguished." So Bennett has lighted a candle for liberty that no fanaticism can ever put out.

At the Chickering Hall meeting it was resolved "that we pledge ourselvs to continue to do whatsoever true men and true women may rightly do to reverse this whole current of procedure," and it was suggested by one of the speakers that each person in the audience might in his individual capacity go forth from that meeting and create a healthy public sentiment that would prevent in future the enactment of such monstrous wrongs under the sanction of the law. I do not know how that suggestion was acted upon by each, but I do know that public thought has much changed since those days; and I ask each one of you to go forth from here and to do what you can to set right the wrong which was done to the truth seeker. Let no one think he is so poor or so humble, or that his sphere is so limited or his opportunities so circumscribed that he can not do something for American liberty.

Mr. Henry Stone, being introduced, said:

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN: Possibly, my friends, it were better that I refrain from addressing you on this occasion, that others more able in language, more eloquent, should occupy the time; and yet, perchance, it were fitting that one who had perhaps much longer acquaintance with our patriot-hero than most or all others here present, should offer his feeble tribute of praise on the dedication of the monument erected to the memory of our late friend, D. M. Bennett, to the care of those who hav contributed toward its erection. Though but a slight token of our esteem, love, and reverence, yet it speaks, and shall continue to speak, volumes to the world. From all over this broad land, from Alaska's ice-bound shores to Mexico's tropical clime, aye, from the uttermost parts of the wide world, loving hands hav toiled, kind hearts hav yearned, to send their feeble mite to assist in the erection of this memento to the memory of him we all learned to love and revere. Could all this band of admirers meet, from the most aged, whose hoary locks are white with the frosts of time, to the little prattler's at their mother's knee, whose ruby lips delight to lisp his honored name, no hall in this broad land is capacious enough to giv them shelter. Yet, as the years go and come, and the centuries pass away into the dim vista of the past, even so with a thousandfold more rapidity shall the admirers and lovers of that most noble man, D. M. Bennett, augment and increase to an innumerable throng.

I could not, my friends, even were it possible, wish in some wild outburst of enthusiasm or fickle flight of fancy to picture our martyred friend as more than human. It was for this we loved him, perhaps, more than aught else. Mild, loving, and generous, noble and true, yet fallible, therein proving that he, like ourselvs, was at times beset with temptations, and tempted by charms that allure, perhaps sometimes to our detriment and final regret.

His life was an open book, that all who chose might read. Did he make a misstep, his only care seemed not to cover it from sight, but to apologize for and punish himself by confessing it to the world. Then ghoulish fiends, reeking in filth and corruption themselvs, sought to whitewash their own records by blackening his. Such tolled their own death-knell. They are as dead to-day as the very mummies in the catacombs of Egypt. But enough. The lives of the noble, the good, and the true are ever a standing reproach to those who liv in sin and shame.

In the cause of humanity, its interests, prosperity, and growth, and in defiance of all that conflicted therewith, our friend had the courage of a Napoleon. For those who sorrowed and suffered he had a heart as sympathetic and kind as that of the loveliest of women. But, my friends, it is not my purpose on this occasion to enumerate the virtues of Mr. Bennett, to extol his noble, grand sentiments, recall his ardent love and devotion to the cause of humanity. 'Twere a waste of words. Far better revere his memory, emulate his noble acts by adopting them into our own individual lives. While time shall last, and language remain, his own homespun, hearty, and honest writings and sentiments shall speak far more forcibly and eloquently than tongue or pen of ours. Even our own granit monument, beautiful and lasting though it be, that marks his last resting-place; aye, or shaft of brass or bronze, shall crumble with the lapse of time, but the monument carved by his master hand shall know no decay. Brighter and brighter, more grand and noble, burnished by the fleeting cycles of time, shall it stand forth a conspicuous guide and mile-stone for generations yet to come. When the requiem of mighty nations yet unborn shall hav been sung, when the cloud-piercing steeples, reared by their hands, their most durable monuments and loftiest domes, shall hav crumbled in dust, still shall the names of those who hav died or imperiled their lives that humanity might liv, ever glow with increasing luster.

Mr. T. B. Wakeman was called upon for the final and benedictory word, and in response said:

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN: This late hour, the beautiful, graceful, and truthful words which we hav just heard in regard to our departed hero, render unnecessary and almost improper any further word than the formal one of dedication and consecration, which the president calls on me to speak by way of benediction.

Yet those words would be without meaning if you did not for a moment grasp and gather into your minds and hearts the substance of what has been said, so that you may know and feel what this man has been, and what the cause is, and will be, which will make him remembered ever more among the lovers of liberty on earth.

Of the man, so much has been said that I will not add my store of reminiscences; for I hav many things, too, that I would like to tell of my intercourse with him. As a lawyer, I was sometimes consulted by him, although on his final trial I was not his counsel, but his friend and his bail. As a lawyer, I may plead my privilege not to reveal, as well as the time of the evening, now so far spent, admonishing brevity, as good reasons for omitting what I else would be happy to say.

Let me refer, however, to one point, to which our friend Mr. Andrews has referred, and as to which, although speaking the truth as he did, yet, as I fear and think, the whole truth was not said, and therefore his remarks might leave some little misapprehension.

It is true that the undermining process began long before the final stroke came which removed our friend from us. It is true that Mr. Greeley gradually wore out his life to a great extent before the final breaking up of his powers. Yet the last great exertion, with its affliction and strain, was the real blow that brought him down. It is true, in like manner, that Mr. Bennett's toil for years may hav weakened his heart and brain; but the truth, testified to me by himself and by his noble and devoted wife, is that, although it took many strokes to weaken his great heart and brain, it was the last stroke—that stroke of infamy which fell upon him from that ecclesiastical persecution, and that imprisonment which followed it, together with that severe illness which afflicted him during its early period, which really weakened his constitution and brought next the final stroke which ended his life prematurely. Many strokes on the solid rock but prepare for the fracture; the last breaks.

This much only as to the individual. I indorse fully all that has been said about his honesty, his devotion, his truthfulness, and the fact that, reaching the great, plain, common sense heart of the country, he stands deservedly with Thomas Paine as one of the intellectual emancipators of the great common people of America; and as such, if you are just, and the lovers of liberty in this country are just with you, he will remain in his life results for years and years a beacon of living light and hope to millions.

So much may we say of the man, for back of him stood a cause—and what cause? You may grasp it one word, LAW against LAW. He was devoted to the new meaning of the word "law," as the test of liberty and morality, and of the highest hopes of man. He taught the new meaning of the word "law"—its scientific meaning. The word "law" has two antagonistic meanings. It means, commonly speaking, now, and has meant almost invariably in past ages, the enforcement of human authority and enactments by means of force and prosecutions. That human, artificial, legislativ meaning of the word "law" is fast becoming the old one, and that great change was the cause in which Mr. Bennett spent his life. He was intent upon placing the new meaning of the word "law" in place of the old. The old, or the authoritativ, meaning of the word "law" has come down to us when men did not understand that there were really laws of nature, or of the world around them, and so they took all the law and order they had from the authority of tradition. The savage peoples hav yet their taboo, which is the root of, and answers with them for, the whole mass of legislation which the civilized world has evolved from it. As you proceed higher in civilization, you find that this authoritativ sense of law becomes more and more weakened. Contracts and wills take the place of status and traditions. Just in proportion as people become more and more satisfied that there are laws of Nature and of human evolution, the law of authority falls. The observation of the order of the world around us; the record of the facts observed, disclose an order and a regularity which is the higher and the true order upon which only human life can be beneficently based.

Now, the great movement of the Liberal world and its thought, in which Mr. Bennett became prominent, was to teach that Nature and her laws were really the proper bases of human life, instead of the blind traditions and authority of the past. Law, as authority, is restraint against liberty. It is the giving up by the individual under restraint—the blind restraint of a human command or custom—that freedom which is of the very essence of life. This restraint, the reason of which he does not know—for very often no good, substantial reason can exist—makes life a mental and physical prison. The reason of it is lost, because it comes down from a past wherein the reason of the law was lost, so that the faith, traditions, belief only remain.

But under science, which grasps the mighty world itself, as but a name for order, the word law is designed to mean the natural order as the basis of the life we hav. That is an entirely different phase of life, thought, and feeling, and it has given us the modern world and its new life.

For upon this last, this scientific notion of law, rests the very idea of liberty. Liberty is not possible in this world until that transition is made from the old authoritativ word "law" to the new scientific order of Nature as law. Upon the order of Nature law means the line of least resistance; that is, the line or direction of the great play of things in their free, easiest course, which is liberty itself. The ordinary movements of all things occur according to that free line, so that liberty and law, in that sense of the word "law," are always synonymous. The play of the world's forces is free; the play of our forces, when we become a part of the world's forces, is free. It is by this law that we are "emancipated, regenerated, disenthralled," in so far as we annex ourselvs to the beautiful, free, overflowing order of Nature.

Thus we catch a glimpse of the mission that this man whom we loved performed. He taught the great common people that the authoritativ traditions, the authority of the churches, the restraints which the past throws over the present, are now unnecessary; that true religion was not in binding ourselvs back by bonds which had been thrown upon us from the past, but that true religion was in uniting ourselvs to the chariot of the stars, to the powers of Nature, to the order of the world in which we liv. Of that grand emancipation he was largely the prophet and the missionary among the plain, common people of our country. His qualities, as a sincere, plain man, fitted him for that position peculiarly, and as Mr. Andrews has just said, it is only those who are broad and general enough to see somewhat the length and breadth of the mighty cause in which he was a soldier, who are capable of appreciating his efforts and life.

And now that we may do that, see: Liberty rests upon law, and morality rests upon liberty. Never forget that. Unless there is a choice, a liberty to do right, and also to do wrong, there can be no morality. For unless there is liberty, there is no power of choice. Unless there is a power of choice, there is no morality in our intentions or actions, but merely blind obedience to force, which is slavery. This man, known and honored by thousands, was known and honored not as an immoral man, but as their chief emancipator and the guarantor to them of the possibility of true morality, based upon the laws of liberty. Thus I may say that he is rightly honored by the thousands, and even the millions, to whom he has spoken, or yet will speak.

And then, too, in regard to the motiv of human hope, and the great sanction of morality, he, following the line of thought of which I hav spoken, was a true admonisher and prophet. The conscience under liberty becomes the sun of our moral day. It is strange to think that in the past, in the olden times—even the palmy days of Greece and Rome—it was not an independent conscience, but a sort of public opinion, that all the people were striving to enjoy. They had a newspaper immortality before the newspaper came. The shallowness of ancient history and its heroes depends upon the fact that they really had no idea of progress, and, therefore, no substantial future to which they could appeal as against the present as the basis of an independent conscience. Even the glorious lines of Tacitus's Agricola close with the prophecy that his hero should hav the honor—only the honor—of his comrades, and of those who were immediately associated and connected, as succeeding generations in that one single empire of Rome. The Greek had the same idea. His state and its opinion was his heaven. It was all there was then. He was dependent upon the public opinion of the present for the sanction of his moral judgment.

The basis of morality was increased and enlarged, it is true, when we entered the Christian phase of thought, because then there was a heaven—supposed to be, at least—and an appeal to that from the present and its injustice was possible. We could open our hearts to that Higher Power above, where, it was supposed, an infinit wisdom, an infinit justice dwelt.

But now, under the new sanction of liberty and morality, see how much deeper and broader the conscience becomes! The present homage and present life of the old antique hero might end, as it often did, in injustice and disappointment, if, as in the case of Aristides, his neighborhood or his compatriots disowned him. The Christian heaven itself might fail, because what erring man could ever be sure that the infinit justice would not strike down both him and his conscience as faulty and unworthy?

But now, under this new evolutional view of life, our heaven is placed here in our own hearts, in our own capacity to do good, and in feeling and knowing the infinit consequences of that capacity and enjoying them as if attained. Under the laws of evolution and development, we hav at once a guarantee against Mrs. Grundy of any present public opinion, independent, too, of any heaven, or God in heaven, independent of all earthly power, in the grand approval of our own conscience, and in what it commands us to do, because we know that what it does is eternal in its fruits and consequences. It is the turning-point that takes hold of both past and future, and is justified by them. Change egotism and egoism to altruism; make your happiness rest upon the satisfaction that you hav in the fulfilment of the objects of life, which you know will be permanent and eternal as time, and you are independent of all mortal men and all gods or devils; your sanction is above all gods; you become forever your own—the true hero and guide and pilot of your life. For the only true heaven is the one you carry in your heart.

Under that mighty sanction our hero lived and worked as best he could. He did what he did under the difficulties which surround the trying life which has been pictured to you. His heroism was manifest and praiseworthy because it was exhibited often under adverse motivs, passions, and feelings (and he was always too candid in confessing and revealing them), and under serious embarrassments which always more or less hampered him. Yet he stuck to his principles of truth and liberty nobly, truthfully, usefully, to the bitter end; and for that we are here to bear witness and to honor him.

Can a monument honor him? No. Says the wisest man:

Und wo die Freunde verfaulen	And where the friends decay
Das ist ganz einerlei	All the same t'will be,
Ob unter Marmor-Saulen	Whether under marble shafts
Oder im Rasenfrei.	Or in their turf-beds free.
Der Lebende bedenke	But thoughtful be the living,
Wenn auch der Tagihm mault,	Though oft the day is awry,
Das er den Freunde schenke,	That he to friends be giving
Was nie und nimmer fault.	What now and never can die.

Yes, monuments to him were and are nothing; the monument that did amount to something was his own work and the approval of his own conscience. No one could, no one can now, add to that. But monuments, needed monuments are for us; monuments to the cause may indeed be useful. They may tell a blind and thoughtless people that in this living cause was an immortal power more durable than bronze, more solid than granit. Not to him need we build monuments, nor for him, but for ourselvs, that we forget not, nor let the generations unborn forget. Thus shall these stones share the endurance of the cause which was his own, become a part of his immortality and inspire us and the ages to come.

Therefore, my friends, we, with one thousand other compatriots, hav raised this monument to the love of liberty more enduring than bronze. We hav made it the memorial of a life which was, and is, and shall be typical of the great cause of law, of law as the basis of liberty, and of liberty as the basis of morality, and of conscience. That monument, whose image is before you, I, as one of this committee, am charged to declare, is now complete. It stands as a speaking witness of the man and of his cause. Let it be delivered over to those who shall came after us—to the lovers of liberty on all this broad earth, and throughout all the ages, as solemnly dedicated to the memory of the truth seeker, D. M. Bennett, and consecrated thereby to the cause of liberty forever.

Mr. Wakeman's remarks were frequently interrupted by applause, which was also hearty and long-continued at their close, as had been the case with every speech throughout the evening. It was after eleven o'clock when the audience were dismissed.

Some Recollections of an Interesting Event.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Attending the dedication services of the Bennett monument, and hearing his former acquaintances relate their remembrance of the grand old man, hav awakened in my mind some reminiscences of him that I am certain your readers hav never heard the details of, and which may not be altogether uninteresting. The particular occasion of which I would like to speak is that of the reception given Mr. Bennett by his employees upon his return home from Albany. This matter is briefly alluded to by him in his glad announcement of "Home Again" in The Truth Seeker of May 8, 1880. He says:

"We arrived here at a little past seven in the evening. . . . All the attaches of The Truth Seeker were in waiting. The office was illuminated, speeches were made, songs sung, toasts given, etc. California wine in reasonable quantity was placed upon the large imposing-stone in the composing-room, and I found a wineglassful did me no harm, it being the first drop of wine or beverage of any kind I had tasted for nearly a year. The Reception Committee held a meeting in Science Hall building, which I attended."

This does not tell the whole story. Of course, to Mr. Bennett, it was but an incident in the series of grander receptions that were given him; and he could not giv it the space in his paper that I know it occupied in his heart. Permit me to relate the circumstances and proceedings.

There were some ten men in the office at that time. During the imprisonment of Mr. Bennett E. M. Macdonald was raised from the foremanship to the position of editor and manager; I took his place as foreman, and Mr. Henry J. Thomas, since then the editor of a mercantile journal published in this city, was proofreader. The boys had been "laying back stiff" in anticipation of the coming event, which cast its shadow before in the shape of a huge wicker-covered receptacle filled with a light variety of nativ wine, scarcely more intoxicating than an equal amount of sweet cider. As a matter of fact, I believe anything in the form of a stimulant would hav been powerless to increase the exhilaration already felt over the prospect of seeing the "doctor" again. The office was at that time lighted with lamps, of which there were about twenty. These were lit and placed upon the imposing-stone, mingled with glass bottles, Indian clubs, and dumbbells, with the wicker-covered object in the center. There was nothing ornate about the display, but we conceived that the general appearance was cheerful. Old Mr. Bronson, who had come all the way from Streator, Ill., to welcome Mr. Bennett home, found his way among the boys, and enjoyed himself, though considerably overcome by the cordial reception he met with.

About 8 o'clock Mr. Bennett reached the office. Proceedings were then opened. The cork also was drawn both of the bottle and of the enthusiasm which had been hitherto repressed. A few moments of quiet followed while we shook the hand of the hero; then the glasses were filled and emptied, Mr. Bennett, as he himself relates, drinking a wineglassful and finding it did him no harm. For my part, I do not believe he ever drank anything in his life that did him more good. Cheers followed in unregulated numbers. Mr. Bennett addressed a few words of thanks to the men for this evidence of their joy, and then, admonishing us to "hav a good time," he left us to attend the meeting of the Defense Committee, of which he speaks. The meeting of this committee was called in a room adjoining that where we were holding services, with a not very substantial partition between. As our communion services progressed, the Defense Committee began discussing the desirability of adjourning to another part of the building, which they finally did. This was not so much because their deliberations disturbed us as because ours made it impossible for them to present their arguments effectivly.

It was deemed desirable for the printers to offer a considerable number of toasts, and as guests dropped in upon us occasionally, the supply of toasting material was eventually exhausted. An intelligent compositor was detailed to procure more. He was a rollicking and irresponsible youth named Wendeborn. It may be worthy of note that this young man did not immediately return. His absence, it seemed to us, was unreasonably prolonged. Search was instituted, and he was found in a neighboring "Weingeschaft" playing a game of ten-point eucher with the proprietor to decide whether he should pay for the wine or not. He was induced to return, and things went on again. Somebody suggested that a song would not be inappropriate to the occasion, and the "Isle de Blackwell" was started, the participants forming in prison file, each man with his hands on the shoulders of the man in front of him, and all marching around the imposing-stone. Dr. Foote, Jr., Mr. Elliott Preston's present victim, dropped in and was assimilated. All the current songs were taken up and executed in turn until exhausted, and "The Truth Seeker Collection" was brought out and sung through. Not everybody knew anything about singing, nor ever sung before or since, but I put it on record that they all sang then.

Mr. Bronson, during all this, was a silent though apparently appreciativ spectator. Attention was finally turned in his direction, and an impromptu orator explained the circumstances of his presence. He received three vociferous cheers. But the enthusiasm did not stop here. His hat, of peculiar structure, also got an ovation. Then one enthusiastic genius, rising to the exigencies of the occasion, grasped the old man's umbrella, and mounting a chair, waved it aloft and shouted, "Three cheers for Mr. Bronson's umbrella!" The response was immediate and overwhelming.

At twelve o'clock Mr. Bennett came in to bid us good-night, and after a final cheer, all hands went home, feeling that we had enjoyed a quiet and orderly meeting, though such, it appeared, was not the opinion of Mr. Hugh Byron Brown, the proprietor of Science Hall, and he so expressed himself as we passed by his door. Some printers might, considering the occasion, hav felt justified in drinking to excess. It was different with us. True, young Wendeborn was in the act of leaving the place without his overcoat, and I was obliged to remind him of that fact. But this proves nothing against his sobriety, because another person committed the same act of forgetfulness. It was the writer of these lines.

These are the circumstances of the occasion as they remain fresh in my memory. A word as to Mr. Bennett's employees. They were loyal to a man when Comstock was terrorizing all connected with The Truth Seeker. Because they knew him they held their faith in him when others turned traitors. There was universal sorrow among them when he died; and as his body lay in the temple on the day of his burial, they went there in sad procession, and placed upon his coffin their united offering of flowers.

Good Again.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I refer to your editorial in the issue of June 14th, in reference to the League's work. I think your position is sound. There would be just as much reason in asking the League to commit itself in favor of or against Spiritualism as to require it to vote for or against prohibition.

The League has a well defined platform, or set of principles. It is no "compromise," as Mr. Mitchell seems to think, for the League to refuse to champion anti-prohibition.

Because I do not agree with some Liberals on prohibition is no reason whatever why I should drag that question into the League, and denounce its defenders as illiberals because they object.

Prohibitionists are ready to discuss the question outside the League to the heart's content of the anti's in any publication open to them, or on the stump or rostrum.

Mr. Leland Protests Humorously.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav probably, in my time, by patience and perseverance, accomplished a multitude of sins; but what particular wickedness of omission or commission I ever wrought upon Brother George Gage, I hav not the slightest remembrance. I suppose I am getting old, and memory failing. I wish George Lynn would tell me where or when I ever saw George Gage sick and ministered not unto him, in prison and visited him not, naked and didn't toss him a cast-off neck-tie. I think, and hope, George has somehow mixed me and the other George up, and by some chance there will be a basket-hole of escape for How Persecution is Carried On in India.

The following extract from a letter recently received from India explains itself, and shows that the enemies of human progress are never idle. Kedarnath Basu is a gentleman of fine culture, of honest, earnest endeavor, with marked ability to do good. It is to be hoped that the base slanders circulating against him will not be entertained for one moment by anyone in this country, or that his sincerity will be doubted by any friend of Freethought.

Susan H. Wixon.

. . . Some of the enemies of mental liberty are persecuting me to their heart's content, and trying to put down my Freethought propaganda by manufacturing and circulating base slanders against my character. They are doing their best to thwart my project of the Universe, a new publication, and I learn that they are sending papers containing defamations against my character to my friends in America and England, with the evident intention of deterring them from assisting me. A false Freethinker named Kaliprasanna Kavyabisharad has joined the enemies of mental liberty, the minions of superstition and bigotry, to help circulate slanders against my character. But you will see from the persecutions that we are steadily gaining ground.

The Limit of the Power of Reason.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav been much interested with Mr. Andrews's reply to my criticisms, and shall make no apology for continuing a discussion which, I hav no doubt, is both interesting and of practical use for your readers.

I believe there is less difference of opinion than I had supposed, yet upon some points the difference is sufficiently great to demand a more complete investigation.

The difference really all comes from Mr. Andrews's objection to my statement "that our knowledge of the future is altogether dependent upon our knowledge of the past." Had I said that it is limited by our knowledge of the past, Mr. Andrews would be entirely correct, and I would be at fault, for, like him, I believe in the power of reason to illuminate the future, and to enable us to see what will be, because it must be.

But the question comes up at once: What does this reasoning power work from? Does it require a basis in the form of knowledge, or can it supply itself with its own material? Now I hold that reason always works from a knowledge of the past, and is altogether dependent upon it, and if its knowledge of the past is correct, its knowledge of the future is correct also; while if its knowledge of the past is false, its knowledge of the future is false also; and thus I maintain that our knowledge of the future is altogether dependent upon our knowledge of the past. That is easily proven. Let any man go into a lunatic asylum and he will find there men and women whose reasoning powers are perfectly sound, and if you grant their premises their conclusions are perfectly correct; but their premises are false, based upon false knowledge, and their conclusions are false also. The Puritan ministers hav ever been celebrated for their logical powers, but they reasoned from false knowledge, and the possession of true knowledge enables us to detect the mistakes of their logical deductions.

Mr. Andrews brings forward the mathematical problem and the use of the mariner's compass to show the power of reason. But complicated mathematical problems can only be worked out because we hav acquired sufficient knowledge to giv us reliable data to work from. All the mathematical knowledge we possess has not enabled us to find out the exact distance from the earth to the sun, for we hav not yet acquired sufficient data to calculate it exactly; and the mariner's compass is only of use because we hav an exact knowledge of the place we want to go to. It is of no help to us if we desire to sail to an undiscovered country, and surely will not tell us anything as to the kind of a place we will find when we get there. It is an improvement as to the means by which men find their way to other lands, but it does not add one iota to our foreknowledge.

But the most striking example of the failure of reason to enable us to foretell the future, when not supplied with sufficient data to work from, is its failure in enabling us to foretell the condition of men in a future existence. After the best investigation possible, the only conclusion the best thinkers hav reached is that we know nothing about it. Why? Because we hav no knowledge of the condition of those who hav gone before, and having no knowledge of the past, we can hav no knowledge of the future. Even the knowledge that the Spiritualists believe they hav, is built upon their supposed knowledge of the condition of their deceased friends.

Taking all these facts in consideration, and granting, as I fully do, that the reasoning power has been given to us to enable us to foretell the future, I believe I am justified in holding to my statement that our knowledge of the future is altogether dependent upon our knowledge of the past.

Then the next question is: Hav we sufficient knowledge of the advance of society in the past to enable us to foretell what the final outcome will be? And right here Mr. Andrews and myself differ, and I will simply state my reasons for believing that we do not hav sufficient data to enable us to foretell what will be a perfect order of society.

All we really know of the past of society is this: For some four or five thousand years society has been developing in some special directions. Mankind is getting healthier; there is more individual freedom; there is more willing co-operation; there is more production; there is more land cultivated, and it is under better culture; the facilities for travel and commerce are better; there is less tendency to war and a greater desire for peace; instruction is more general and of a better kind; machinery is coming into more general use, etc. We can safely reason that society will keep on advancing in those several directions. But does it tell us what a perfect society will be? Not at all, for we hav no knowledge how far this advance will maintain itself, nor whether any new factor may not come in and change the whole surface of things. One dozen or one hundred new discoveries, each as important as the use of steam or of electricity, may yet be made, and change not only the physical conditions of things, but change the character and mental qualifications of men. The very qualities that we now prize the most may become entirely obsolete. We hav seen that change, for there was a time when physical courage was the highest attribute of men, and education was a reproach; and just such changes may take place not only once but a dozen times.

The simple fact that Mr. Andrews acknowledges that no two minds will entirely agree as to what would constitute a high order of society is sufficient to disprove his claims to a scientific foreknowledge of a high order of society.

The soundness of scientific hypothesis is tested by its ability to explain details. It is in explaining details that the Christian logic breaks down. I hav often met Christians or Spiritualists who claimed to hav a pretty clear idea of the condition of things in heaven, but a very short cross-examination would entangle them in a mass of contradictions, and very easily show that they had never tried to work out their own belief, but had contented themselvs with generalities. And it is the same with the future society. Let us take one single example. I personally believe, and I suppose Mr. Andrews will agree with me, that at some future time the people will so thoroughly understand the laws of health that there will be no disease. What does it imply? That there will be no doctors, no drug stores, no patent medicins, no hospitals, no summer resorts for invalids, no winters spent in Florida, no nurses, no people moving about in search of health, no early deaths; besides, our systems of education, our modes of life, our forms of marriage, all will hav to be changed to conform to our greater knowledge. Add to that the extinction of war and all that pertains to it, a better distribution of property, banishing want, and we will hav a state of society so entirely different from the actual state that no one can realize the difference except in the broadest details; and yet these are only three of the changes that are now going on, and do not take in consideration new changes that may take place.

The modern scientists hold that the way to sound knowledge is from the known to the unknown, but they also realize that the power of reason is limited, and depends upon our knowledge of the past; and I still maintain that when reason tries to fathom, not the near future, not the need of the day, but that which lies far beyond our horizon, it fails, always has failed, and always will.

Yet, as I said at the beginning, there is less difference of opinion than I had supposed. In the heat of the argument, if I read his reply aright, Mr. Andrews had spoken more positivly than he had meant. It was because it read like a condemnation of those who work for the needs of the day that I accepted what sounded like a challenge, that I was unwilling to see it unanswered. As it is, I hav also my ideal of society, and although I hav reached it by a different road, it would agree very closely with that of Mr. Andrews, as defined in his explanation of Universology. But I do not take my ideal for my guide, for I know that it is not the result of sound reason, but the work of imagination. I follow the lead of nature as it places my work day by day before me, satisfied with its daily reward, a daily portion of personal happiness. I am one of those who believe that nature has a clear, objectiv point; that it marshals its forces as accurately and intelligently as the growing plant prepares for the fruition of its seeds, and that our best work is done, not at the dictates of our high ideal of society, but in doing that which lies near our hand, leaving the results to the care of Nature itself.

Self-Interest.

Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, in Man, says: "I know of but two predominant motivs to human conduct, the one self-interest, which spurs a man to conquest of gain and power, the other a religious motiv, which leads men to acts of noblest self-sacrifice for their God and their fellow-men." And he seems to rely on a "religious motiv" to inspire men with enthusiasm in the work of reform, while "self-interest" is spoken of as leading to "the old and oft-repeated," and "mad efforts of the few to rise again on the ruins of the many." And he further says, "There must be either a revival of despotism, or there must be established a guided spontaneity." Now, whatever may be the meaning of "a guided spontaneity," self-interest seems to be looked upon by him as a motiv which leads to very undesirable results, and Mr. Palmer seems to be in a quandary or "hard up" for a motiv to inspire Liberals with enthusiasm.

It seems to me, however, that self-interest, the desire for individual happiness, is the strongest motiv that can be brought to bear to work up enthusiasm among the people in opposing the systems of error and superstition which hav so long held the world in ignorance and sin. All mankind desire to be happy. It is this "which leads men to acts of noblest self-sacrifice for their God and their fellow-men." It is this which leads men to avoid wrong and the hell which they hav been taught must follow wrong. It is this desire for happiness "which spurs a man to the conquest of gain and power," to honest labor and toil, as well as all dishonest efforts to accumulate wealth at the expense of others. It is this self-interest or desire for happiness which spurs or leads men to all manner of crime or wrong. In short, it is the leading motiv by which men are worked up to enthusiasm in every department of life. And why not utilize it in the cause of reform? There is no selfishness in it unless others are wronged. And this motiv which moves and governs the world in all departments will move and govern the world of reform as soon as the people learn that self-interest—enlightened self-interest—naturally impels or leads to reform and right conduct in all the departments of life. It is the interest of all to do right, or to liv and act in harmony with nature, which is the same thing, and happines can be obtained in no other way, neither in this world nor in the world to come. Let this be understood, and reform naturally and necessarily follows, self-interest being the propelling or leading force.

But the teachings of the church and clergy hav been otherwise, and this propelling force perverted, "good works" misrepresented as "filthy rags," and ignorance and wrong has been the result. But let the laws of nature, the laws of human nature, and the constitution of man be understood, and this leading or propelling force will lead or drive the people to the right, or to do the best they can or know in all directions. The divine laws of nature will then be studied and learned instead of the human laws of God, written and interpreted by ignorant men in the Dark Ages. The laws of health will also be learned, and the people know how to liv and be well, instead of sick and under the necessity of paying half their earnings for medical aid; and they will save the enormous expense of supporting and paying seventy thousand preachers in this country for teaching religion, which has proved a failure and cursed Christendom for ages. And then nature's retribution, no forgivness, no way of escape, will be learned, instead of substitution; that suffering always follows wrong, and swindling, and fraud, and embezzlement will be carefully avoided, as we avoid putting our fingers in the fire. If swindlers, gamblers, and monopolists knew their own interests, self-interest would lead them to liv honest lives, and "each for himself" would be for all, too, instead of "the devil take the hindmost." Yes, self-interest is all right, and leads or drives all mankind, and must be caught and tamed, enlightened and utilized, or otherwise reform will be forever held in abeyance.

The Country Newspaper.

Among the many hindrances to the most useful intelligence may be found the country newspaper. By a great majority of its readers it is held infallible, and, as a rule, the man or woman who makes it a point to giv it a thorough and unquestioned perusal performs the highest duty, and gratifies the last need. The editor by his patrons is regarded as a sort of autocrat, and every word coming from his mighty pen is considered too sacred for confutation. As they hold him in reverence as being the great exponent of the most valuable information, so does he stand in awe of them, careful to never say anything worth saying, lest he excite criticism or shock the over-sensitiv feelings of his life-long admirers. Rather than lose one subscriber he will tell a hundred falshoods rather than one truth for truth's sake. Prevarication, subterfuge, and dissimulation are his strong points; in these lies his success. That he possesses religion in any shade or form is the last thing one would think of, his past record bearing no evidence. But if he deems it a necessity to antagonize something not in keeping with orthodoxy, he almost startles one with his display of piety. We are almost overwhelmed with disgust, and immediately perceive what contempt was intended for. Did this mogul of the rural province possess half the wisdom he imagins, he must be aware that his opinions, stale, threadbare, and erroneous, are fast becoming obsolete, and he himself must go to the wall. There are men to-day who hav a deep and sincere love of truth, and are growing tired of seeing it misconstrued and perverted. Being sincere, their purpose is to rebuke injustice whenever the occasion demands. Mental liberty is fashioning itself to the minds of the people, while cowardice, self-interest, and indifference to principle must ere long expiate the wrongs they hav so wantonly infiicted. Just now a "quaint old town" rises to our view, venerable with its hundred years or so, and orthodox, too, I know, being "nativ there, and to the manner born." Probably never since the time of its christening has its theological peace been broken, never a doubt to disturb its placidity. But I am told of late Freethought has invaded its holy precincts, boding a "winter of discontent." Emphatic expressions derogatory to time-worshiped tenets hav set men and women to thinking who never thought before. The village newspaper mentions it as though it were an "invincible armada." Evidently despite "our paper" there will be in the near future a revolution of thought that will effectually arouse the inhabitants from their supine quietude. When country editors are taught that it is their imperativ duty to enlighten themselvs before assuming the task of teaching others, men will not hav to forswear religious convictions to obtain political honors, as is witnessed repeatedly. If an editor is not capable of giving his readers the best, he had better step down and out, as there are some who might take his place whose capabilities are unquestioned.

Facts and Fallacies in Regard to the New Testament.

THE CHRISTIAN HEAVEN.

There is no text in the Bible, either Old or New Testament, that describes heaven as a desirable abode for either saints or sinners after death The New Testament positivly asserts that in heaven we hav no especial love or affection for those so near and dear to us in this life. Yet the parson assures the heart-broken young mother that the death of her beautiful baby was a dispensation of divine providence, the act of a loving heavenly father to turn her thoughts to heaven; that Jesus will restore her dear babe to her loving arms, and in heaven again she shall read the love-light in its bright eyes, and her heart thrill with joy as she givs and receives its dear caresses. The weeping widow is bid by the pastor to dry her eyes, for in heaven she will meet again her dear loved husband, never more to part. The heart-crushed father moaning over his dead child, his noble boy, the joy, hope, and pride of his life—the parson declares that son shall liv again in heaven, and there father, son, and all dear loved ones shall dwell together for all eternity in joy, peace, and love made perfect.

If the New Testament is true, every word of this oft-used consolation is utterly and wholly false, for Christ himself positivly declares, "For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels which are in heaven" (Mark xii, 25).

Christian reader, do you realize the force, the true meaning of this declaration? Those who attain heaven will be as the angels, who never knew human love; never had near or dear ones, father, mother, brother, sister, husband, wife, children, kith, nor kin. And when we rise from the dead, Christ says, all human love shall cease. We become as the angels, and regard all alike.

Despite your many doubts and fears, your convictions, at times, of the falsity and absurdity of the teachings of your church, yet you hav bid reason, truth, common sense, avaunt! as you desperately cling to Christianity in hope of the promised joys of heaven, the first, greatest, best, and chief of which is reunion with your dear loved dead.

Would heaven be a place of joy, or even endurable, if, when you meet those you so truly, dearly loved on earth, you find they hav no more love or affection for you than they hav for stranger angels, or the saintly Guiteau, Jesse James, or the glorified ones who reached heaven via the scaffold and hempen cravat route?

How we hav been deceived by church, priest, and parson! In the language of the immortal bard:

> "Be those juggling fiends no more believed
> Who palter with us in a double sense
> And keep the word of promis to our ear
> To break it to our hope."

Jesus himself declares there can be no love of husband, wife, mother, father, brother, sister, or children in heaven. In harmony with this is the declaration of Christ to the multitude: "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother, and wife and children, and brothers and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 26).

And the context calls attention to the great necessity of first counting the cost before becoming a Christian or trying to gain heaven. "Whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 33).

When we hav become so truly Christian; when we hav learned and practiced the teaching of Jesus and the New Testament that we hate father, mother, brother, sister, wife, and children here on earth, we shall be able doubtless to get along without their love or any especial love for them in heaven.

The word "hate" in Luke xiv, 26, is translated from the Greek word miseo, and is found twenty-four times in the New Testament. Its definition is, "to detest, to abhor, to regard with ill-will."

The following is Webster's definition: "Hate—to hate, abhor, detest, abominate, loathe." Hate is the generic word, and implies that one is influenced with extreme dislike. Our savior is said to hav hated the deeds of the Nicoloitans; his language shows that he loathed the lukewarmness of the Laodiceans; he detested the hypocrisy of the scribes and Pharisees; he abhorred the suggestions of the tempter in the wilderness.

The learned D.D.'s, in their frantic efforts to explain away this damaging testimony, claim miseo should be translated, "love less." Even if we accept this strained interpretation, we then hav Christ's own declaration that in order to become Christians we must love less father, mother, brother, sister, and children, than we do God, Christ, and angels, whom we hav never seen, whom we are to meet for the first time on our arrival in heaven.

Christians are fiercely indignant because we doubt the divine authority for some Bible statements. They declare we must not pick and choose—accept what pleases us and reject what what we think opposed to right and reason. We must believe every word of God's holy Bible just as it is written, and they quote: "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrin, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (2 Tim. iii, 16, 17). Will some learned D.D., priest, parson, or humbler Christian please to harmonize the words of Christ (Luke xiv, 26) with the inspired testimony of John (1 John iv, 20)?

Lukce xiv, 26.	1 John iv, 20.
"If any man come to me, and hate not [love less] his father and mother, and wife and children, and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."	"If a man say, I love God, and hateth [love less] his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen."

Christians promis eternal life in a heaven of delight, happiness, and joy. They promis to all who will become devout Christians reunion with their loved and lost, that they shall dwell together forever in heaven, the home of perfect love.

Where is the authority? Christians claim the Bible abounds in promises of all this. Giv us one chapter—giv us three consecutiv verses that, honestly construed, even intimate any such thing. Where is the one single verse that promises we shall be restored to our dead loved ones and liv with them through all eternity? We do not ask for "I think," "I believe," "I feel assured." Giv us the Bible for it. You cannot, for it does not exist.

CHARLES B. REYNOLDS.

The Unprogressiv Nature of Religion.

Civil government, as well as society, has yielded old landmarks and adopted new methods instead, in order to harmonize present times and circumstances. Old laws are repealed, or by common consent stand obselete; new ones are enacted, not in honor or obedience of the sentiments of our ancestors, but to meet the necessities of to-day, even the probable requirements of the near future, and all tending to accommodate the "living, activ people."

Religion alone refuses to yield a single step; she alone flaunts her borrowed vestments as of old, when her ancient priests, gifted with the knowledge of astronomy and other sciences, stood, intellectually, so high above the average people, as, with slight effort, to make them believe what they chose. They found the populace ignorant, and determined to keep them so, but this was not enough; ignorance alone did not suit their purpose; they added superstition, and by his combination their schemes were at once successful, and their trade became lucrativ.

And is it not even so to-day? Do not the clergy arrogate to themselvs the power to dictate to their respectiv flocks, "what they shall eat, drink, wear, what pleasures they may partake of, and on certain days what labor they may perform, if any?"

Happily, "love" is no more the exclusiv birthright of the priest; the common folks begin to think, reflect, compare, and form their own conclusions; the black gown and skull-cap are no more shield against criticism. So beware! ye vicegerents of the great I am; ye self-appointed guardians of mankind; the time has come when you must feed the people on solid food. An empty stomach will no more be satisfied with a promised feast on "glory hallelujahs;" nothing short of real victuals, immediately furnished, will stay its cravings.

When a man is poor, aid him in obtaining bread for his children, but do not rob him of his last shilling on the pretext of praying the poor soul of his departed relativ out of purgatory. If there be such a soul, at such a place, deserving of punishment, let it be punished. The body, after decomposition, having lost all sense of feeling, cannot be punished; and if the soul, as a part emanating from that whole, which very many call God, is liable to punishment, "it is the whole God who punishes part of himself," and if that affords him pleasure, far be it from us to interpose.

Revelation of Paul.

This book was fabricated about the year 380, and is, therefore, hardly worthy of our notice. It purports to hav been found underneath the house of Paul in Tarsus. A nobleman living in the house in the reign of Theodosius and Gratian was told by an angel three times in a vision to upturn the foundation of the house, and having dug he found a marble box containing the Apocalypse of Paul.

The apostle being taken up by an angel into the heavens under the firmament saw sinners punished and saints rewarded. Within the circle of heaven he saw the river called Ocean, which surrounds the whole earth. The city of God was one hundred stadia (eleven and one-third miles) square, and bounded by four rivers flowing with milk, honey, oil, and wine. On the south side, where the milk flowed, he saw all the infants that King Herod slew.

Outside the city, looking westward from the river of the ocean that supports the firmament, he saw a river into which sinners were cast, some only up to their knees, others up to the tops of their heads in the water. At the southwest was a river of fire, where the wicked were suffering intolerable torments, aggravated by torturing angels. In a well, which the angel unsealed and from which an intolerable stench issued, were confined the souls of those who maintained that Mary was not the mother of God, that the Lord did not become man out of her, and that the bread and the wine were not his flesh and blood. For these, as well as for those who denied the resurrection, there was no mercy.

Looking up into the firmament, Paul saw the archangel Gabriel coming with a host of other angels to judgment. Sinners in torment entreated Gabriel for mercy, causing both him and Paul to weep. Gabriel said: "Perhaps the good Lord may hav compassion and grant you remission." So when the son of God came down in great glory at the sound of the trumpet, the sinners appealed to him. And there came a voice saying: "What good work hav you done that you are asking for rest? For you hav done as you wished, hav not repented, but you hav spent your life in profligacy. But now, for the sake of Gabriel, the angel of my righteousness, and for the sake of Paul, my beloved, I giv you a night and a day of the holy Lord's day, on which I rose from the dead, for rest." For this small remission they blessed and praised the Lord.

The last scene which Paul was permitted to behold was paradise, where Adam and Eve transgressed. Afar off he beheld a woman coming with a multitude of angels singing praises to her. This woman, he was told, was the holy Mary, the mother of our Lord. She saluted Paul and praised him for his good works in the world. Next came the righteous forefathers Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the whole succession down to Manasseh. They said: "We knew thee in the flesh before thou camest forth out of the world." Then came Moses weeping and lamenting the unbelief of his people. "When the Jews hanged the son of God upon the cross," said Moses, "all the angels and archangels, and the righteous, and the whole creation of thing in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, lamented and mourned with great lamentation; but the impious and insensate Jews did not understand; wherefore, there has been prepared for them the fire everlasting and the worm that dies not."

After Moses came "Isaiah, whom Manasseh sawed with a wood saw," "Jeremiah, whom the Jews stoned," and "Ezekiel, whom the slayers of the Messiah pierced." "All these things," said they, "hav we endured, and we hav not been able to turn the stony heart of the Jews."

Then came Noah, who said he built the ark in a hundred years without putting off his coat or shaving his head; and yet his coat was not dirtied nor his hair diminished.

Christianity's Legitimate Fruits.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Permit me to call the attention of your readers more particularly to the atrocious persecution of a Liberal, Mr. J. M. Wheeler, who, it is stated in an editorial note on page 361 of THE TRUTH SEEKER (June 7, 1884), acted as "interim editor" of the London Freethinker, after the infamous sentence and imprisonment of Mr. Foote.

You state that Mr. Wheeler's insanity (he is now a lunatic) was occasioned solely by (Christian) persecution of the Freethinker, and the incarceration of his friend, Mr. Foote.

Let this stamp of double-dyed infamy rest forever upon Christianity, and when hypocritical and canting priests tell us of that beautiful religion of theirs, so full to overflowing with pity and compassion, point them to this, and a million other black crimes committed in its name. Let this abomination never be forgotten by a single Liberal, young or old, who reads these lines, and if ever his or her endeavors to crush out the bloody superstition which instigated this act should flag, the thought of the assassination of a free and noble intellect will serve as a spur to renewed and tireless effort.

In another editorial note on the same page of THE TRUTH SEEKER, you speak of the hanging of Lloyd L. Majors, and of his dying confession of religious belief. Like many millions of Christian sneaks (excuse the word, but it best and most exactly expresses my meaning), he felt entirely confident that through the grace of God he would be saved by the atoning blood of Christ.

It seems to me the whole wretched system called Christianity never appeared more utterly reprehensible than in this instance. This apology for a man who said that "he considered the Bible and the holy spirit the only rules of conduct for man in this life!" Beautiful rules of conduct, were they not? First, to make a man a murderer, and second, a shameless shuffler who was willing and eager to crawl into heaven upon the merits of another man! Verily, great are the glories of Christianity, and of the faithful disciples and apostles of him, the Christ of Nazareth!

The Monument Dedicated.

We giv in full the speeches and proceedings at the final and formal completion of the monument. That the orations would be appropriately eloquent was to be expected from the well-known ability of the speakers, but the love they all bore for him whose virtues they told inspired them to more than ordinary effort, and consequently each speech is a gem in its way. Perhaps Mrs. Macdonald mentioned the present editor and his brotherly assistant a few times too many, but that must be charged to motherly love, and not set down prejudicial to her usual good sense. One thing in the speeches that will probably surprise the reader is the ease with which each orator showed Mr. Bennett to be especially interested in his particular thought. This is accounted for by the fact that Mr. Bennett had more than one idea, and was the friend of all reforms. But he was preëminently a Freethinker, using the term in its sense of opposition to Christianity. He rightly held that the church is at the bottom of about all of the evils humanity is suffering under, keeping the ignorant and unthinking in perpetual bondage to the idea that God made them as they are, and therefore it is sinful to repine at their lot, while to openly rebel against the present constituted order of society is moral crime of the most heinous nature. He regarded the abolition of superstition and mental slavery as the grand reform, inclusiv of all others, and necessary to the achievement of any of them. He was practically an Atheist, though he sometimes expounded pantheism, declaring his philosophical adhesion to that belief. He was converted to Spiritualism by phenomena occurring in his own household and elsewhere, and he reasoned out a philosophy covering the ground he took of "Material Spiritualism." It is due to him, now that he is unable to speak for himself, that these facts should be known. Though they hav been stated repeatedly, both by himself and by us since his death, it was only a few weeks since that we joined a party who were discussing these points as vigorously as we often discussed them with the hero himself.

We giv also a full-page picture of the monument, showing its face and one side. Upon the face the lettering is plain, and can easily be read; that upon the other three sides is as follows. On the second side:

"Demonstrated science may be regarded as the only true source of knowledge.

"What is called revelation is a snare, a delusion, a falsehood. Those who claim to speak for the gods simply speak their own thought.

"The gods do not speak; they are as dumb as the rocks, they are as speechless as the grave. With Nature it is not so. To know her is to know the truth, and to study her is to be wise."

The third reads:

"The object of our lives should be to make this world as beautiful, and ourselvs and our fellows as happy, as is in our power.

"I can hardly yield my consent that this is the last of our individuality; and I fondly think that Father and Mother Nature are able to accomplish the best, greatest, and most desirable of all problems—a continued individual existence. But I am borrowing no trouble about it."

On the fourth, which is shown in the cut but is not lettered, is engraved:

"I believe in the eternal powers and principles of Nature, in the superiority of good lives, in acts of kindness toward our fellow-beings, and in efforts to spread the light of truth over the dark spots of the earth.

"Each person must be responsible for the good or ill he does. Here is our duty, here is our allegiance, and not in the sky above us. We must make our heaven on the earth, and not in the air."

The burial lot has been beautified by Mrs. Bennett, who is as devoted to her husband's memory as she was to him in life, finding her greatest consolation in lovingly adorning his resting-place, by planting flowers around the border of the lot, placing therein two large bronze vases filled with flowers, and two bronzed settees for the convenience of visitors. An appropriate footstone has also been erected by the same wifely generosity. The appearance of the lot is radiantly beautiful, and friends in the vicinity will find a pilgrimage to the cemetery well repaid.

The cost of the monument, including a bill not heretofore counted because unpresented, has been $1,465.65. Of this $1,460.24 has been paid, leaving only $5.41 to be made up. This exhibit is gratifying in the extreme, alike creditable to Liberalism and the friends of Mr. Bennett. The work has been a spontaneous offering of devoted Liberals, and their generosity is worthy of all praise.

PICTURES OF THE MONUMENT.

The engraving of the monument, which has caused a delay of one day in this week's issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, is not designed to supersede the lithograph, which will be ready soon, but serves merely as an outline of the latter, and also in a slight way as a redemption of the promis of the committee. The lithograph will be a work of art really to be admired. Messrs. Buek & Lindner hav spared no pains to make it as artistic and satisfactory as possible, printing it in seven colors to obtain the right effects. The medallion appears in bronze, presenting a fac simile of the monument itself. The foliage of the trees around presents a natural appearance, and the dim gray background givs the dark polished granit of the shaft an imposing and solid look, as though meant to stand the war of centuries. The inscriptions are all printed in the lithograph, together with the locality of the work, method of execution, and date of dedication. We hope that in appropriate frames they will ornament the homes of all Mr. Bennett's friends.

The League Organization.

In replying to what Mr. Underwood terms silly remarks of Mr. Leland, the Index says:

"In response to this, we stated frankly, but courteously, that the National Liberal League had by its repeal policy alienated from it the great mass of Liberals, and it was now without vitality, influence, or harmony, and that, if there were to be a convention to form a National Liberal organization (of which we were in favor), if it could be effected on a wise basis—namely, the principles of the state secularization), it should be held without connecting with any of the existing organizations. Our suggestion, in harmony with Mr. Bradford's remark, was prompted by the desire only for such action as should prevent antagonism, and not render fruitless all efforts to unite Liberals for a common purpose. We knew the League was identified in the public mind with the obnoxious policy that had made it a failure; that, until the adoption of this policy, the League was an object of but little, if any, interest to the present leaders; and that they would never consent to a recission of their repeal resolution; or, if this were done, and the League was put as far as possible in the position it occupied before the date of the Syracuse Convention, that neither these men nor those whom they represented would feel any further interest in it. Now, the attempt is made to giv the impression that the officers of the Leauge hav made a most magnanimous offer in the 'new deal,' proposed, and that the Index has treated it with contempt. Neither statement is true. We will only add that, when a serious effort affording any promis of success is made to unite the Liberals of this country in a National organization, it shall hav our support and co-operation."

Judging by this, the Index is apparently in favor of an organization devoted to state secularization, and promises co-operation. The chief officers of the League—the president and secretary—understand it this way, it seems, for Mr. Leland, in last Man, makes the proposition to the Syracuse soreheads that the League go back to first principles as the easiest way to a reconciliation. The secretary says:

"In the article before us Mr. Underwood now writes of a National Liberal organization 'of which we [Mr. Underwood] are in favor,' and givs the assurance that a 'serious effort to unite the Liberals shall hav our support and co-operation.' Why didn't he say that before? Has the generally expressed Liberal sentiment of the country shown him that he is not sustained—that organization, or a reorganization, can go on without him, and that he would better hav met reconciliation, at least a step or two, if not half-way? Anyhow he seems to hav struck a light from some quarter, and is now in favor of something. We will take him at his word and see what will come of it.

"Here are two questions, preliminary to an all-inclusiv movement:

"1. In any organization, with the hope and design of including all Liberals, would the Index and its friends approve of any expression in the new platform in opposition to what is now known as 'Comstockism?' We need an explicit answer on this point.

"2. If the Index and its friends answer affirmativly on the first question, would they accept the ground taken in the original League Congress held in Philadelphia in 1876—would they indorse either the Whereas and Resolution introduced by Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews, or the two resolutions introduced by Mr. B. F. Underwood, or would they accept both? We here reprint all these resolutions so that they and the country may hav the whole proposition before them:

"MR. ANDREWS'S RESOLUTIONS.

"WHEREAS, There are many symptoms of a growing intention on the part of the religious power to re-establish a virtual censorship over the press and the post-office, by influence exerted over the several legislativ bodies, under the pretense of zeal for the public morals, but really in behalf of religious and ecclesiastical despotism; as, for instance, in procuring a body of loose, dangerous, and oppressiv legislation against the circulation of 'obscene literature,' under which, it is believed, some of the purest and best men of the land are at this hour suffering in prison or stand in danger of their liberties; therefore,

"Resolved, That we recommend to the members of the League and to the public the utmost vigilance and the closest scrutiny in detecting and unveiling any such conspiracy or conspiracies against the liberties of the people; and that they should thus commence the accumulation of facts upon which the League may, if found requisit, act specifically to procure the entire repeal or righteous modification of all such laws."

"Mr. Underwood said: 'I hope the resolution will not be laid on the table. I think the resolution is not only relevant as it now stands, but appropriate. I should be sorry to hav this congress fail to pass a resolution so well defined and appropriate as that. There is not a word in it of approval of any wrong act, or of any obscene work. I think it our duty, under the circumstances, to sustain this resolution, and I hope it will pass.' Would Mr. Underwood say that now?

"MR. UNDERWOOD'S RESOLUTIONS.

"Resolved, That this League, while it recognizes the great importance and the absolute necessity of guarding by proper legislation against obscene and indecent publications, whatever sect, party, order, or class such publications claim to favor, disapproves and protests against all laws which, by reason of indefinitness or ambiguity, shall permit the prosecution and punishment of honest and conscientious men for presenting to the public what they deem essential to the public welfare, when the views thus presented do not violate in thought or language the acknowledged rules of decency; and that we demand that all laws against obscenity and indecency shall be so clear and explicit that none but actual offenders against the recognized principles of purity shall be liable to suffer therefrom.

"Resolved, That we cannot but regard the appointment and authorization by the government of a single individual to inspect our mails, with power to exclude therefrom whatever he deems objectionable, as a delegation of authority dangerous to public and personal liberty, and utterly inconsistent with the genius of free institutions.

"If the Index and its friends will now take that action and approve that ground, the president and secretary of the League would also indorse it as the plank on Comstockism in the new platform, and we think the majority of the National Liberal League would approve of it. If all sides should agree on that, and the present officers of the League decline re-election, as they propose to do, so as to leave the whole field open for a re-organization, would not that place the National League 'as far as possible in the position it occupied before the date of the Syracuse Convention?'"

The president of the League, in Man of even date, puts his proposition this way:

"BEGIN AT THE START AGAIN.

"To go back to First Principles is one of the best, easiest, and most non-committal ways of getting out of present differences. Some friends of the Liberal League hav advised that it begin at the start again, as it did at Philadelphia in 1876. Our secretary has worked out the suggestion in another column, and certainly it is worthy of serious attention from all dissenting Liberals.

"We are reproached by those who say there should be some general union of Liberals, with having induced the League Congress to do or say something that prevents a general co-operation. At the slightest intimation that we might be in the way, we withdrew personally.

"Now, we second the suggestion to let all of the by-gones be sunk as though they never were, and try to meet on the original League platform and the proceedings at Philadelphia in 1876, and start anew.

"Men and Brethren, what more can we do? Shall we issue the call for the Congress in that form?"

Paine once remarked to George Washington that, in considering a certain line of conduct he saw fit to pursue, the world would hav great difficulty in deciding whether he was an apostate or an impostor. The same puzzle will meet the future historian when weighing—if he hav scales so small—the course toward the League of the Free Religious journal, unless the program be heartily adopted. It is certainly a generous enough concession to irrational prejudices and personal spite. But we question the wisdom of making too strenuous efforts to get into the League gentlemen whose previous efforts hav been directed solely to two purposes—ruling and ruining the organization. Mr. Underwood at Syracuse stultified Mr. Underwood at Philadelphia. If the gentleman honestly thinks he was mistaken in 1876, he has not said so; yet respect for his subsequent attitude to the League would seem to demand such a declaration.

Mr. Leland's activ work as secretary of the League has shown him the difficulty of maintaining intact an organization devoted to such a mass of reforms as appears in the platform proposed at Milwaukee. He has all along been in favor of a return to first principles. We are pleased to see that he has converted his distinguished confrere and official superior. It is pleasant to learn, in connection with this conversion, that between the two gentlemen there has never existed any real difference of opinion. Replying to an editorial in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 14th, in which we quoted Mr. Leland as gratified that nearly all the Liberal journals agreed with him in wanting to stick to secularization as the sole object of the League, and Mr. Wakeman as sorry that the proposed Milwaukee platform should be overslaughed and forgotten, Mr. Wakeman says:

"ONE THING AT A TIME.

"Thus says THE TRUTH SEEKER of the duty of Liberals, and tries to make out some difference between the secretary and president of the League as to the objects of the League. There is no difference, and the point is not well taken, but the confusion of our esteemed neighbor may be the occasion for us to clear up a general misapprehension. The object of the League is secularization, and all that the word implies, which is certainly one thing, and THE thing as to which we may all be agreed. But how can this one thing be attained? Evidently by political action only. That was the main purpose of the League when it was founded, and every Congress has taken measures looking in that direction. But it has been ever manifest that this political action must be achieved through a Liberal party organized for the purpose, or else by a coalition with existing political parties. But no such party action compels Liberals to adhere to and emphasize their own issue as one measure only of a great party. The people, as every sensible man sees at once, will require to know of that party how it proposes to administer the affairs of the country generally. What will be its policy as to foreign and domestic affairs, the tariff, revenue, currency, internal improvements, etc., etc.? Now, when Liberals and the League project their own issue they are bound to recommend some party or platform with it. As well might you order your cook to get up a dinner out of one article only as to seek to run this great nation on the issue of secularization only. A cook with the motto, One dish only for a meal, is not likely to be engaged. The secretary was speaking only of the League issue upon which all Liberals could rally, while I was in the same paper calling attention to the political measures Liberals were likely to favor in the general management of the country which every political party must undertake, if it undertakes administration at all. The last Congress recommended the measures it felt would be most consistent with the great question of secularization. That recommendation, we regret to say, has been generally misapprehended. It did not make that platform a part of the League at all, nor bind any one to it. It was an indication of the political drift of Liberal thought, and a very great and most important indication, to which the Liberals hav failed to respond as they should. The range of Liberal thought seemed to be below it, and unable to grasp its noble and far-reaching statesmanship. More than one thing at a time seems to confuse its vision. But things seen in this single way are not properly seen at all. Things, and especially measures and issues in politics, reform, and statesmanship, can only be seen in their relations. The political relations which are implied by and which consistently go with the policy of secularization, are the subjects which can alone make that policy visible and practically attainable. We hav been ready to co-operate with any party which would, with most consistency, bring forward our issue. The Congress declined to recommend that course, but projected a platform as the suggestion of a party, thus repeating the attempt at a new party inaugurated in Cincinnati in 1880. But now, as then, the Liberals fail to respond. Lately, however, the Liberty party and other reform parties hav stolen their thunder to such an extent that it may seem best to add our issue to theirs, if we can, and go in with them for General Butler as the best exponent we can find of secularization, and of the issues and reforms which it implies. Can we not be more unanimous on this than on any other course? If a new Liberal party is impracticable, what other than the great financial, anti-monopoly, and labor reform candidate can attract the sympathies and votes of Liberals?"

As to the disagreement, we are willing to rest the case. Mr. Leland said one thing, Mr. Wakeman another; if that is not disagreement, the English language is more marvelously flexible than the Hebrew tongue appeared when Mr. Huxley stood aside and admired the grammatical athletics of the theologians who find in Genesis the records of evolution.

That attempts to affiliate with other reform political parties hav resulted unhappily is natural. Not one of them has publicly expressed sympathy with secularization, or embodied a single "demand" in its platform. Why, therefore, should the League go to them any more than to the older parties? If B. F. Butler will answer affirmativly the questions we addressed him last week, we will work for him; otherwise not. Our president is a poor politician to throw himself into the arms of a candidate before he knows whether he will be welcome. Of course, if he regards Greenbackism or Anti-monopoly as above secularization of the state, he does right in voting for Mr. Butler. He would be untrue to himself did he do otherwise.

One more point, and then we will turn to the interesting Mr. Walker, who proposes to issue from his rustic retreat of Kiowa this fall and commit the League to the issue of repealing all laws against obscenity. Mr. Wakeman remarks that "as well might you order your cook to get up a dinner of one article only as to seek to run this great nation on the issue of secularization only. A cook with the motto, One dish only for a meal, is not likely to be engaged."

Mr. Wakeman's ambition is great, and, like Cæsar's, will likely be his ruin. Brutuses are scattered all around in the shape of other political parties who want to run this nation. Had Cæsar been content with guiding destiny instead of taking it into his own hands, he would hav lived longer, and consequently accomplished more. When Liberalism is powerful enough to elect a president, there will be no need of doing so. To win a perfectly secular government is all that Liberals can logically do as a body of Free-thinkers. Action to that extent is all that is necessary. The precise method of action can be determined when there is something to act with.

Now to Mr. Walker. He is, so far as heard from, the only person bent on using the League for all imaginable purposes, from abolishing the presidency to repealing the state statutes against obscene literature. Quoting our statement that "it is the business of the League to fight for Freethinkers oppressed by the church, and we are amazed that a proposition should be made to practically nullify this clause by suspending the agitation for the repeal of the Comstock law. We are for the repeal of any law under which can be worked such monstrous iniquity as imprisonment purely for opinion's sake and for this reason, and on constitutional grounds, must vote for repeal first, last, and all the time," Mr. Walker replies:

"That is very true in its argued statement, and very good in its stated determination. There is no room for any exception here which should allow any law which can work such wrong to stand. Mr. Macdonald distinctly says that he is for the repeal 'first, last, and all the time,' of 'any law' which can be used to imprison for opinion's sake. That is the position that I assumed when I declared that in the next congress of the League would be 'offered resolutions demanding the total and unconditional repeal of every statute which limits freedom of choice in the realm of letters and art.' Whereupon Mr. Macdonald expresses the hope that 'our fiery friend will forbear,' tells me that if I want an organization which shall make this demand to go outside of the League and organize one, and not deny to the League 'liberty to confine itself to its rightful purposes.' What a jumble of contradictions we hav here! 'Confine itself to its rightful purposes?' Has he not just said that one of the rightful purposes 'of the League is to defend those prosecuted and persecuted for opinion's sake on the subject of religion and morals?' that he is 'amazed' that a proposition should be made to suspend the agitation for the repeal of the law denying liberty of opinion? that he is for the repeal of 'any law' which does this?

"Does not a 'state' law do this as well as a 'national' law? What is the use of trying to draw distinctions where there are none? Is a prison cell for opinion's sake less dark and terrible because the state of New York instead of the United States government sends a man there? Is denial of liberty of thought by a state less criminal than its denial by the nation?"

We can go a good way with our rhetorical friend in regard to the repeal of the state laws under which Comstock has worked much iniquity, but Mr. Walker knows as well as we that there are publications which newsdealers should no more be allowed to sell than druggists should be permitted to hand poison over the counter to every child or half insane person who asks for it. We believe in a strict construction of the Constitution, letting Congress exercise the powers delegated to it by the Constitution, and no other. For that reason we think the Comstock statutes should be repealed. We also shall work for the repeal, as we said, of all laws under which men can be imprisoned purely for opinion's sake. If under any present state law men can be thus imprisoned, repeal it. But we deny that statutes suppressing those publications manifestly intended to inflame the sexual passions can be inimical to Freethought. But shall we endeavor to force our opinions upon the League? If we had a personal end to achieve, and thought that in that way we could see success, we might try it, as the movers of the Milwaukee platform did. But would it be right? Decidedly not. The League was organized to compass state secularization; and men and women are asked to join it with that object in view. A majority of those present at the last Congresses hav incorporated other issues, some of which are, in our opinion, grand and noble, and some are not. But the point we make is that it is unfair to the minority to make them advocates of political reforms they do not like. Members joined the League for the purpose of getting the Bible out of the schools, and other reforms of that nature which are duly specified. They are now asked to work, among other things, for the abolition of the presidency, the promotion of co-operativ association, with loans from the public treasury, public aid to indigent colonists, and to uncompromisingly combat the so-called Republican and Democratic parties—which, however good in themselvs, are not properly among the purposes of the League. To illustrate the unfairness of this, we will quote a few illustrations from Herbert Spencer:

"Suppose [he says] that at the general meeting of some philanthropic association it was resolved that, in addition to relieving distress, the association should employ home missionaries to preach down popery. Might the subscriptions of Catholics, who had joined the body with charitable views, be rightfully used for this end?"

Again:

"Suppose that of the members of a book-club the greater number, thinking that, under existing circumstances, rifle-practice was more important than reading, should decide to change the purpose of their union, and to apply the funds in hand for the purchase of powder, ball, and targets. Would the rest be bound by this decision?"

Again:

"Suppose that, under the excitement of news from Australia, the majority of a Freehold Land Society should determin, not simply to start in a body for the gold-diggings, but to use their accumulated capital to provide outfits. Would this appropriation of property be just to the minority? and must these join the expedition?"

"Scarcely any one would venture an affirmativ answer even to the first of these questions, much less to the others. And why? Because every one must perceive that by uniting himself with others, no man can equitably be betrayed into acts utterly foreign to the purpose for which he joined them. Each of these supposed minorities would properly reply to those seeking to coerce them: 'We combined with you for a defined object; we gave money and time for the furtherance of that object; on all questions thence arising we tacitly agreed to conform to the will of the greater number; but we did not agree to conform on any other questions. If you induce us to join you by professing a certain end, and then undertake some other end of which we were not apprised, you obtain our support under false pretenses; you exceed the expressed or understood compact to which we committed ourselvs; and we are no longer bound by your decisions."

If this does not enable Mr. Walker to see the point we shall hav to giv him up as one blinded to the hight of the mountain by too close observation of the dirt at his feet.

A Suspicious Attack of Honesty.

Most of the extremely pious people, especially in the East, it is well known, are Republicans. Yet they seem unable to swallow the party candidate, if we may regard the religious press as voicing their sentiments. The Independent bolts the Chicago nominations squarely. The Christian Union regards them with "unfeigned regret," and says that the best Republicans will "stand quiet" in the campaign, having an "unalterable determination not to support Mr. Blaine for the presidency." To the Congregationalist his nomination is "a sad disappointment." The Baptist Weekly expresses a like aversion to Blaine, and the Boston Christian Register, the organ of the New England Unitarians, says that voters who desire decent politics "hav no further interest in or use for the Republican party."

Letters from clergymen sustaining these journals in their bolt are also numerous, ranging from Henry Ward Beecher up and down.

In view of the morality generally prevailing in the church, this change of expression is bewildering to the onlooker. In the recent explosion of bubbles in Wall street every defaulter and dishonest bankrupt was a church-member in good standing; and the ministerial lapses from virtue hav been alarmingly frequent of late, so frequent, indeed, that our space is over-taxed in fulfilling the duty to the public shirked by the religious press.

If we could regard this sudden cry for honesty in politics as the turning over of a new leaf on the part of the religious public, great credit would be given them. But the days of miracles are past. There must be some other reason.

GEORGE CHAINEY gave the closing lecture of the series in this city last Sunday. His subject was "Walt Whitman." There has been but one expression regarding Mr. Chainey and his lectures; that is, that the addresses possess unusual literary merits, and that he is an orator of fine parts.

Letters from Friends.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., June 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith I send $2, for which please giv me credit on subscription to the grand TRUTH SEEKER. It is better than any of the eight or ten Bibles of creeds, because it labors for the advancement, elevation, and happiness of mankind. It labors to diffuse light and knowledge among men, while the priests strive to enslave and degrade them.

Yours, P. V. WISE.

VINELAND, N. J., June 13, 1884

MR. EDITOR: Thanks for your specimen copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I was pleased to notice your petition for state secularization. I cut it out per order, and hav thirty-one names. I think I can get quite a number more, but I want to be sure and send it to you in season.

I am a Spiritualist, but more than that a Liberalist, and feel the deep need of Spiritualists and Liberalists uniting forces for all our sakes. Fraternally yours,

MRS. JENNIE A. DOANE.

CANTON, OHIO, June 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Through my son I came in possession of THE TRUTH SEEKER three years ago, and a better paper I never read. It has been my Sunday companion ever since I left the church. I hav paid a good deal of money to the preacher, as neither the church nor the preacher's house was paid for, and every once in a while the preacher had to hav a little donation. But I think now it would hav been better if I had risked damnation. I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER, therefore I inclose $3.25 for it and the ANNUAL. DAVID S. AUNGST.

WESTFIELD, N. Y., June 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to the suggestion of A. E. Ringer, please allow me to ask, Why not make the principles on which our republic is founded (that the powers that govern are derived from the governed) a leading plank in the Liberal platform? A truth demonstrated in every organic form, and although ignored by the religion and science of the day, seems to me to be the only basis on which a republic can sustain itself. Hoping this question will receive the consideration it merits in the coming convention, it is respectfully submitted.

J. TINNEY.

STERLING, ILL., June 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am able at present to send my own name only, as there are very few Freethinkers, Spiritualists, and Infidels at this place where I liv. But I hope every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will send in his name, at least.

There should be one more point added in secularizing marriage, which would also perhaps solve the Mormon problem, and that is, the marriage ceremony should be performed by a United States officer, and not a priest or religious preacher of any kind, but a legal officer, to make it legal. I hope some one will prepare a lecture on the same, which should be printed or published in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours truly, F. C. KRAMER.

BURTON, TEXAS, June 13, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received several circulars from one Livezy, who claims the miraculous power of completely silencing all and any Infidels in the land. He calls particular attention to his answers to letters from Infidels inclosed, which to me is quite cranky for a man presuming so much. I don't see how he expects to make plain the foolishness of scripture by giving us more of the same kind of hash.

I should be on the watch for him if in Ingersoll's or the president's place, for fear another Guiteau had sprung up to receive a divine command to murder some one. He exults in about the same kind of tirade as Guiteau did before he assassinated the president, and to prevent another such sad occurrence, I think this apostle should be confined.

H. B. JONES.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., June 16, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find three dollars to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year.

I also send you some circulars that I received in April from S. G. Lewis, of Grass Valley, Cal., representing a work which he calls, "A Revelation in Sexual Science." I gave some of them to some friends, and they wished me to send with them and get the book, which he would send for 25 cents per copy, or five for one dollar. We sent the dollar and received five envelopes, each containing eight pieces of paper, 5x8 inches, the contents mostly from other writers. I suppose he got my name from the "Freethought Directory;" and now will you tell what name would be the most fitting for him, fraud or humbug? Yours, C. W. COREY.

BUTTE, MON., June 11, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $6.30, which please apply as directed. I think your paper is better than ever, especially since the "Children's Corner" was started. What tenderness and pathos in that sketch of "Susie's Death!" John Peck is a good one; his articles suit my taste. I feel sorry for Elliott Preston and Mattie C. Mitchell. Vivisection may be wrong, but I do not think the doctors use unnecessary cruelty. They need practice to get nerve for man's benefit.

I don't use liquor, but sincerely hope these inflammatory prohibitionists will use more cold language. It is only brutes that abuse whisky. During our long winters, the saloon is a great help to our poor who cannot obtain work; and cabins and wood are very scarce for many an honest workman. They get light, warmth, and reading for nothing, hundreds of them. And all this must be stopped to save a few chronic drunks. The saloon is all right if used right.

In regard to human happiness, I think Elmina is right. Those persons who can see nothing but crime and misery on earth must be bilious and experts in the use of government socks. From my own experience and observation, I believe the majority of the race are happy. I hav had to "rustle" without aid since I was ten years old; am a cripple, hav no education, no brains, physically weak, and hav always been poor, but yet I am satisfied with life; am happy though I "could harrow up thy soul" with tales of suffering.

Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER family happiness and good luck, I subside. FRED. COOKE.

SENECA, KAN., June 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Hav received three copies of your paper, and find them to be very good, filled with solid reading. If the rest of the papers turn out to be as good as the ones I hav got I will renew my subscription.

There are but few Liberals around here, as the most of the people are German Catholics. John E. Remsburg (whose name I see mentioned so often in your columns) gave three lectures here about a month ago on "False Claims," and on the lives of "Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, and Paine," which were well attended. Some persons who hav looked at THE TRUTH SEEKER say it is obscene. The same persons read the New York Weekly, and say it is filled with good, solid reading matter. As I am but a boy, some persons say I am foolish for choosing such reading matter, but I tell them I am running my own boat, and wish them to do the same.

Yours in search of truth, FRED. H. KERNEEN.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., June 9, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Having just read H. L. Green's hasty letter to you in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 7th, concerning "The Proposed Change in the League," I wish too say that I too concur with him in indorsing all you say or hav said in regard to the League confining its platform to the Nine Demands of Liberalism. We personally do not object to any of the planks it contains, but think some of them are out of place where they are. Further, those nine demands granted, we will hav accomplished wonders; like getting the black sheep through the gate, all the rest are bound to follow. Besides, there is great danger of going to extremes, which should be avoided. The nine demands are the sentiments of all Liberals, but not all their sentiments. Mr. Green says: "There are many Liberals that are not in favor of woman suffrage." If this is a fact (which I hardly concede), and they (so-claimed Liberals) should be allowed to put an anti-woman-suffrage plank in the platform, we think it would be deserted by all true Liberals. For how any can claim to be Liberal, and at the same time deny women rights they claim for themselvs, thus denying rights and privileges to their mothes, wives, and daughters granted to uneducated foreigners and negroes, is more than I can conceive. If there be any such, and this comes to their notice, we hope they will giv their reasons for the same through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and oblige their differing friend,

H. H. HUTCHESON.

DESDEMONA, TEXAS, June 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2, for which please send "What Objections to Christianity?" and "Interrogatories to Jehovah."

Orthodox Christianity in this place is so puny that the brethren can't get up an excitement. There is not a Christian here who is bold enough to undertake a defense of old rotten Joshism. In fact, we are afflicted with but one man who believes in the Mosaic creation—that the world is flat, that the sun did stand still, and that a woman should obey her husband. So we are in a reasonably healthy condition.

We are opposed to any change in the League. The addition of a straw is often sufficient to break the camel's back. Let us stick closely to the Nine Demands of Liberalism and fight it out on this line.

We most heartily second your nomination for president of the League.

The "sky pilots" in adjoining neighborhoods hav killed—yes, hung, crucified, burnt, and forever damned Col. Ingersoll on account of his last lecture. That lecture constituted his unpardonable sin. How sorry we should be that there is no hope now for the colonel's salvation! We hav heard expressions from Christians relativ to this lecture as being the most damaging thing ever given to the public. A great many people in this state are realizing the validity—the truth—in the charge that "every God is the fossilized nightmare of a savage brain."

Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER every possible success, I remain, as ever, A subscriber, A. C. MARTIN, M.D.

MR. EDITOR: I think it was R. W. Emerson who said that the masses of mankind can understand a principle only as its light falls on a fact. Now, I wish to illuminate a fact in the interest of Mr. Hacker, our Liberal free-land man. I will, if he will come here, see that he gets all the land he can work as long as he livs. It shall be good land, well situated, deep, rich soil, not a tree or a stump on it that would weigh one ounce, or swamp, or any other objectionable feature. He shall pay no taxes in any form. It shall be prairie land, and deeply plowed, close to the city; or if that don't do, I will buy as many town lots not five minutes' walk from the city, and place him in possession of them on the above terms. Now, Mike, do you hear me? If you don't come up and take that, shut up! You don't know any more about the land question than a horse does about astronomy. I am just as much in earnest on the home question as any man, and I fancy I hav seen some of this country and hav been as poor as any one. I hav traveled in twelve states, and upper and lower Canada, and passed the first twenty years of my life in England. I hav been a cripple from infancy, consequently am an incapable, and my sympathies are with that class, the only class any one need to trouble about. All others can take care of themselvs. I am fully aware of the greatness of the home question, but as the world is, I can see no way of bettering it than each one for himself. I hav tried Communism, and it proved a complete failure. I hav read everything I could find on the subject, and hav carefully watched the labors of all nations and classes of people, and am free to acknowledge that I am yet in ignorance. Sometimes I think of writing a pamphlet on "How to Get a Home," but second thoughts hav always forbidden it, when I thought that fools rush in where wise men fear to tread. I hav made myself a comfortable home on a small scale, commencing without money enough to pay the first week's board, and now I believe I could repeat it in a thousand different ways. But it took me a long and laborious road to find the way, and hence I hesitate to advise, knowing that many must fall by the way.

WARRENSBURG, MO., June 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I received your kind letter of May 29th. I am very sorry that my circumstances are such that I am absolutely unable to settle up my account with one of the best moral instructors on earth, THE TRUTH SEEKER. The Investigator is also one of my favorits. I can't decide which is the best. I constantly distribute them among friends and foes—to whoever will read them. I frequently send them on missionary work to my friends in other states.

There is not another Infidel to Bibles and Christianity in this town (of about 6,000 inhabitants) that dares to come square out and face the Christian Protestant orthodox music but myself. But I am going to stick to the work if I die by it. I think that I hav accomplished some little good that I know of. Kersey Graves's "Bible of Bibles" has influenced two preachers, one a Methodist and the other a Dunkard, to quit preaching and quit their churches. Of course THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator did their part, as did their tracts and such books as they hav from time to time sent me, which I distributed.

I am very sorry that I was unable to send a small amount towards completing the Bennett monument. I am sorry that I am left out, and I must tell you how much I hav always sympathized with our late brother, D. M. Bennett, and our cause. While under sentence to the Albany Bastile, while lying in Ludlow Street Jail, I wrote to Peter Cooper to see if it was possible to so arrange it that I could take his place in the prison and serve out the thirteen months in his place. I got no answer. Then I wrote to Brother Macdonald to the same effect. I got no answer in any shape. From a Christian standpoint the principle of one man suffering for the sins of others is all right, but in the eye of the law if I wish to take Mr. Bennett's place, believing him to be entirely innocent, and knowing that he could do so much more good to mankind than I could possibly do, the law will not allow the precedent or principle to be carried out. My object in making the offer to serve out his sentence was to do my best to cause the people everywhere to think and pass judgment upon the Comstock laws, upon the iniquity of Benedict's rulings, and, above all, I wished to see Brother Bennett free, so that his mighty pen might get away with ignorance, superstition, and intolerance.

And this reminds me of one thing, viz., that inside of fifty years the world has got to establish and protect mental and political liberty all over this little globe, or it has got to go back to barbarism, as it was five or six hundred years ago. The Bible, with its bankrupt system of theology, must go, and polygamy with it. All the beasts—or, in other words, the creeds—with their seven heads and ten horns, must go. Christianity is doing its level best against the religion of humanity. One or the other must go, and the way I look at it this wonderful nondescript of a God who is described in our Bible must go. Two things can't occupy the same space at the same time, and as immutable law is our governor and our god, and occupies all space, there is no room for the Christian God, and if that be so, what is the use of an Agnostic, anyway? Why not come square out, call for the proof of his existence, and whenever the priests, or preachers, or anyone else, can show us anything that he ever did that we can't account for without him, let us all fall down and worship him, for those are the credentials we are looking for, and then he will be eligible to a position in our Infidel constitution.

I hav already bothered you too long, but you will hear from me again as soon as I can get out of this high grass. If you hav any more loose tracts lying around send me a few for distribution. Yours for the right, E. BROOKS.

GREAT VALLEY, June 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Among the many thoughts that manipulate the fiber of my brain tissue, is one that I am and hav been your debtor since the 15th of last April, to the amount of three dollars in current funds, for one of the best papers published in America—one that is ever welcomed by every thoughtful, free, and progressiv man and woman, while to those that take the ipse dixit of thus sayeth the Lord, as the final of all truth through faith, and without investigation, by all such THE TRUTH SEEKER is feared and shunned, that is, if they hav the capacity to ever learn there is such a paper, which, we are sorry to say, is the case of but a small number as yet. But then, you know, the chicken must first break the shell and emerge therefrom before he can be said to to be an independent chick. So let THE TRUTH SEEKER keep right on in the even tenor of her ways, until the independent chicks shall constitute a majority, instead of as now a minority, and then each individual chick will know it has as good a right to crow on its own dung-hill as perchance the more pretentious game who would fain hav us believe his ancestral blood was of the pure Jehovah stock; and then won't we cocks and hens, who hav had the courage to trace his pedigree, crow and cackle with joy unspeakable and full of glory?

And now I will submit my case to the wise decision of yours, Mr. Editor and patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER, whether or no there won't be a great decline in the general opinion and price of the Jehovah church stock, all of which I respectfully submit. I listened to the profundity of a reverend Adventist the other evening; one of those wise ones who can harmonize the Bible and make the fools understand it. He was quite a glib talker, with a sanctimonous countenance, which said in actions, at least, "I am more holy than thou." He said in the course of his remarks that through the Advent explanation of the Bible, a representativ Infidel had of late been converted, and that he had the pleasure of leading him down into the water. I asked him for the name and residence of said Infidel. He said his name was Williams; couldn't think of given name; said he lived at Steamburg, this county. I said, "What do you think of the conversion of Brother C. B. Reynolds to Freethought?" He said he thought he was going to the bad. Said I, "You think him honest, do you not?" He said he had his doubts still. I asked if he would meet Mr. C. B. Reynolds at our place, in debate on the question of the divinity of the Bible. He said no; that he would not debate with one who denied the divinity of the Bible. So you see one must first believe in the divinity of the old tradition book in order to get a chance to prove it otherwise. Hocus pocus, presto, change! under which box is the little joker now? Great is Diana of the Ephesians. I am a Spiritualist, a rational one, I hope, of THE TRUTH SEEKER sort. Good-bye.

MR. EDITOR: Who is Livezey? He keeps on sending me printed or lithographed letters, though I wrote to him that it would be an easier task for him to drink the Atlantic than to try to convert me, the red-hottest Infidel he possibly could hav found on the face of the globe. Nevertheless he loses no hope, it seems, and, to a certain degree, he must consider me a dog; the more you beat him, the more he thinks of you. One letter is headed, "Two honest men out of sixty Liberalists." What is his profession?

Harper's illustrated weekly takes great pains in photographing Taylor, Worthington, and Bradley, three newly-elected bishops. Three hard-working printers or farmers I would hav preferred. Bradley (Catholic) is thirty-eight years old, Taylor (Methodist) is sixty-three years old. Both hav found Christ, and him crucified, and all the balance of the nonsense. The pithiest, the most true, the most to the point saying I hav heard or read since my illustrious birth, is Ingersoll's sentence, "The clergy know that I know that they know that they do not know." It struck me so that it has given me sleepless nights, and any amount of food for reflection.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $2, for which please continue my name on the roll of your patrons, as I cannot afford to do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. I expect to keep its company as long as I remain in the body. I hav never been so unfortunate as to belong to any religious organization, church, or creed, but hav always been an earnest seeker after the truth. And now being in my seventy-third year, I feel that I am nearing the close of my present state of existence, and knowing how anxious the church and Christians are to claim Infidels after they are past defending themselvs, their past persecutions notwithstanding, I therefore wish to intrude upon your valuable space and time, for the first and probably the last time, to deny publicly any claim they (the Christians) may make to me or mine, through THE TRUTH SEEKER to its many readers. When I hav left the body that I now liv in, I wish it to be quietly laid away without any display or pompous parade. I forbid any religious cant or hollow mockery over it in the way of preaching, praying, or psalm-singing. As I hav kept clear of such things all my life, through respect for the body I hav occupied so long, I should not like to see it desecrated after I hav left it. As I believe I shall simply pass from this stage of action to a better and happier one, I wish my friends to so act and be cheerful, and not drape themselvs or their house in mourning.

Believing in progression, I expect to take up or continue life beyond the grave, just where I leave off on this side.

MR. EDITOR: I highly approve of the suggestion of our friend at Arrowsmith, Ill., under date of May 25th (Mr. Penn Kirk), that the "Letters from Friends" be published in book form. "I second the motion," as they say at town meetings.

There seems at the present time to be a good deal of discussion on the tariff question, some advocating protection, and others free trade. I can very well remember—say as long ago as 1842—when President Tyler vetoed the Tariff bill which passed Congress at that time, and which was in the interest of protection, that the tariff question was the question in political circles. The Whig party advocated protection, and the Democratic party advocated free trade. President Tyler, as all know who are conversant with the history of the United States, was a candidate for the office of vice-president on the same ticket whereon Gen. William Henry Harrison was a candidate for the office of president, at the election in November, 1840. Gen. Harrison and Mr. Tyler were the candidates of the Whig party, and were placed in opposition to President Van Buren and Vice-President Johnson, the Democratic candidates. Gen. Harrison and Mr. Tyler were elected by a decisiv majority over their political opponents. The tariff, and the alleged extravagant expenditures of the Van Buren and Johnson administration were the leading issues in the campaign of 1840. When, as is well known, President Harrison had been in the office but one month he died, and was succeeded by Vice-President Tyler. When Mr. Tyler vetoed the Tariff bill there was a rupture between him and the Whig party, all the members of his cabinet, with the exception of Hon. Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, secretary of state, resigning in a body. The Whigs were not very complimentary in their language toward President Tyler, calling him "Captain Tyler," "His Accidency," "traitor," etc.

Passing from Mr. Tyler's administration down to the present time, it would seem that the tariff question has been rather in the background in consequence of the slavery question, and the reconstruction legislation of the Congress of the nation, growing out of the late conflict between the states, occupying its former place. Now, however, there seems to be some prospects of protection and free trade coming to the front again by entering into the coming presidential campaign as a prominent issue.

I hav read more or less on both sides of the tariff question. There is very much to be said and written both in advocacy of free trade and protection. Clay, Webster, Greeley—not to make mention of others of less note—argued in favor of protection. John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, Thomas Hart Benton, of Missouri, familiarly known by the cognomen of "Old Bullion," owing to his undeviating advocacy of hard money, Gen. Lewis Cass, of Michigan—men very prominent in the Democratic party—were for free trade. After having read the arguments, pro and con, and after having given the question much thought, as also careful consideration, I hav come to the conclusion that a protectiv tariff builds up and enriches the manufacturer at the expense of the consumer. I am of the opinion that if the question of free trade and protection were to be fairly and squarely brought before the people, the latter system or question would be voted down. The Whig party, from 1835 or '36 up to 1856 (when the party died a natural death) tried to get their system of protection indorsed, but most signally failed. If the present party in power (the Republican) tries this plan during the ensuing presidential campaign, the chances are that it will fail as signally as did the Whig party.

EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

SOUTH BOSQUE, TEXAS, June 4, 284.

MR. EDITOR: As I was a private church-member for about seventeen years, and an honest believer in its dogmas, with your permission I will giv your readers some of the mistakes the common people labor under as regards conviction of sin, conversion of the soul, being born again, heartfelt religion, etc., from my own simple experience.

For thousands of honest people take the foregoing evidences as positiv proof of the genuinness of Christianity and their acceptance with God. First, I was taught that I was a sinner, and unavoidably so, caused by Adam's transgression as well as my own, and in order to obtain God's favor and hav a possible chance of escaping hell and gaining heaven, I must repent of my sins—and Adam's, too—get forgivness for the same, and as an evidence of said pardon I would be made to rejoice for the hope and the change of heart experienced. All these explained and rehearsed on all revival occasions by the clergy, in whom I had the greatest confidence, I never doubted their truthfulness.

When I was about eighteen years old I set about "getting religion," as we called it, and while attending a Methodist camp-meeting I was persuaded by my Christian friends, also the convincing arguments from the pulpit, to go to the mourners' bench and "seek Christ while he may be found." There I prayed and was prayed for. I agonized, and was so earnest in the matter, and imagined myself such a sinner, that I felt to be a great criminal in the eyes of God, although I never had been a bad boy, for I had been strictly moral all my life, had never been drunk, sworn an oath, visited any place of bad repute, or broken the Sabbath; but I was taught that there was less hope for a moral person than a desperately wicked one, and I should plead nothing but unworthiness and total depravity. After praying for hours and trying to perform the duties required, viz., exercising a living faith in Christ's power to forgiv sins, and waiting for that proof "which takes no denial," and makes the mourner shout and praise God, the meeting closed for the night and left me without the satisfactory evidence. Next morning I went to the brush, away from any human beings. There I prayed and poured out my very soul in humble, honest prayer and confession to God, after which I felt greatly relieved, but did not shout. On the way back to camp I met one of the ministers, who saw that I was helped up, and he asked me if I had found the pearl of great price. I answered that I felt better than the night before. He said that was good proof that I was on the "king's highway to holiness." This spirit of satisfaction increased, and after hearing the next sermon I was exultant in the faith, happy to know I had escaped hell and had a home in heaven, which is enough to make any wretch rejoice. If he is of a nervous temperament he will be noisy; if not, he will be quiet, but happy.

And in after years, when any heretical idea would come up in my mind I would think of these as a positiv proof that the idea was a suggestion of the devil, and that there was a reality in the religion of Christ, and that I was an heir of God, and a joint heir with the Lord and savior Jesus Christ, and accepted that and the love I had for the church and Christian people as a positiv proof—"for we know we hav passed from death unto life because we love the brethren."

I hav heard almost hundreds of Christians tell their religious experiences, and they coincided with my own surprisingly, too, which was another proof that I had religion. I hav led in public prayer-meetings, love feasts, class meetings, and had prayer at my own hearth-side. All this I did because I thought it to be my duty.

The first convincing proof I had that there was a mistake somewhere was when I made the acquaintance of a few Infidels. I found they were as honest, peaceable, and charitable as our best Christians, and at the same time I was studying phrenology and physiology, with some other scientific works, by Fowler & Wells, Spurzheim, etc. These caused me to enlarge my list of books, which I hav given much valuable time. Being a poor man, I could not invest much in books, but read and studied what I could get for all they were worth, with the full intent to giv a rational answer to all reasonable questions, for I believed it could be done from a Christian standpoint. But alas for our expectations!

As my letter is already too long, I will close, for I would love to tell you how, while a Christian, I felt called to preach, etc.; and, too, how, since I became convinced that Christianity was a myth, I hav such strong inclination to lecture and tell what I do know about the absurdities of these deluding, emotional evidences; for I hav enjoyed these same soul-cheering, heartfelt religious feelings at the Infidel gatherings, with good music, etc., that I enjoyed at class meetings and other religious exercises. Your honest Agnostic friend, D. F. MARRS.

IT IS ALL IN US.

"No man understands any greatness or goodness but his own.
I swear the earth shall surely be complete to him or her who shall be complete.
The earth remains jagged and broken only to him or her who remains jagged and broken."

Thus writes America's greatest poet, and thus decides the philosopher when he says, "We judge others from our own standpoint." And thus it is with all of us. Elmina is glad, greatful, and jubilant, because her lines are cast in pleasant places, because she has a heredity of hopefulness, and an appreciativness of the good, the true, and the beautiful. It is all in her and she can't help it. She has not uninterrupted health, or wordly wealth, great scholarship and mental genius. She dwells in a small brown shanty and dresses in calico. She has dug and delved, and scrubbed and scoured. She has passed the fiery flames of sickness and death that hav robbed her of parent, sister, and her only darling girl; but over all and through all, the bright sun of hope has smiled and beamed. Sweet flowers hav shed their perfumes, and gay bird-notes hav threaded their melodies. "From the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

Nevertheless, and notwithstanding we allow a broad margin for this natural inherent hopefulness, the fact still remains that even as sunshine abounds more than storms, so does happiness abound more than misery. Will our friend Severance claim that wealth is certain to insure to its possessor that which is most desirable and enjoyable? If all else is compatible, then wealth givs happiness. But as it is, it is the workers, the comparativly poor who liv in huts and hovels, "whose only capital is their muscle," that really enjoy the most happiness; not the ignorant and reckless poor, but the middle classes of life—the laborers and thinkers. I hav been as happy when standing over the wash-tub, or weeding the onion bed, as I hav when threading the mazy dance in a ball room, or riding at my ease in a palace car.

It is all in us. When I take a walk in the cool, breezy woods, I do not not go along peeping into old decayed logs, or crevices in the rocks, hunting for snakes, centipedes, and lizzards; nor am I listening for the howls, snarls, and growls of wild beasts. But I watch for the shimmer of the sunshine through the leaves, and look for the lovely wild-flowers that laugh and smile at me from covert and hedge. I hearken to the myriad cheery notes of insect, and bird, and breeze; of the gurgling, laughing rill; and the thousand melodies of nature, and my heart is filled to overflowing with "sweetness and light."

It is precisely in this way that I go into a neighbor's house. I do not look into dark closets for hidden skeletons, or under beds for dust and dirt, or commence boring them with personal sorrows or grievances of my own. But aiming to take sunshine along with me, I go full of cheeriness and friendliness, and, therefore, meet bright smiles and happy gestures, and hear pleasant greetings, kind words, and merry badinage. Mr. Severance says, "If this world is so comfortable and happy, what means this universal protest for more freedom, more rights and privileges to enjoy life, and why is Elmina trying so hard to bring on a millennium by removing the tenth or hundredth of misery and unhappiness?" I would answer that this continual protest for more freedom and more rights is precisely what is keeping people strong, vigorous, hopeful, and happy. Giv a man all he wants, and what would he be good for? It is wants, desires, and hopes that stimulate and impel us to continuous industry and keep up competition, energy, and life. If we do not work to rectify the tenth or hundredth of misery and unhappiness now existent, it will soon increase and multiply till it becomes nine-tenths and ninety-nine-hundredths, and this is why Elmina seeks to do her part toward this good work.

I deny none of the horrors friend Severance so graphically portrayed; but to insist that these are the fate of ninety-nine hundredths of our brothers and sisters, is only to add to the misery by proclaiming its inevitability. Destroy hope and you crush all motiv for improvement. We hav lived among "factory operativs" all our lives. Mr. Slenker began work in a woolen factory when a mere boy; our son began work in a factory when he was so small he had to stand on a block of wood to feed the picker, and worked for one cent a day, and father and son still make their bread and butter in the woolen mill here, and I will wager that either of them, as well as any "hand" now in the factory, will say their lives hav been more than nine-tenths sunshine. One lady weaver said, only yesterday, that if she could liv forever right here just as she now lives, working in the factory for her daily bread, and having her children kept, and never herself knowing one well day, she would accept this life in lieu of the promised heaven of Christianity, or any future life ever pictured to her view. And right here I echo her statement. Giv me a thousand more years of just such life as I hav had, and 10,000 top of hat, and I will take them gladly in preference to being "freed from this prison-house of clay." I don't care if there are a thousand worlds to come. Nature will be nature through them all. Sickness, disease, misery, crime, and "unsatisfied cravings" will be in every one. Perfect happiness is impossible. It would be stupefaction. I hav never "desired annihilation." I love life. But we don't hav all we love. I adore beauty, but I am homely; I crave wealth, but I am poor; I worship youth, strength, and muscle, but mine are fast passing away. No art has yet discovered the elixir of eternal youth. None will ever find that of eternal life or unalloyed happiness. But all this should only stimulate us to make the best of what is and snatch pleasure as it flies; labor for the bright, the beautiful, and the good, and look on the silver lining of every cloud that flits over our pathway; rejoice in the good the world so lavishly bestows, and do what thou can't to add to the great ocean of happiness.

"What you giv me I cheerfully accept,
A little sustenance, a hut and a garden, a little money, as I rendezvous with my poems;
A traveler's lodging and breakfast, as I journey through the states.
Why should I be ashamed to own such gifts? Why to advertise for them?
For I myself am not one who bestows nothing upon man and woman,
For I bestow upon any man or woman the entrance to all the gifts of the Universe." —Whitman.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

Try Again.

King Bruce of Scotland flung himself down
In a lonely mood to think;
'Tis true he was monarch, and wore a crown,
But his heart was beginning to sink.

For he had been trying to do a great deed,
To make his people glad;
He had tried and tried, but couldn't succeed,
And so he became quite sad.

He flung himself down in low despair,
As grieved as man could be;
And after a while as he pondered there,
"I'll giv it up," said he.

Now just at that moment, a spider dropped,
With its silken, filmy clue;
And the king, in the midst of his thinking, stopped
To see what the spider would do.

'Twas a long way up to the ceiling dome,
And it hung by a rope so fine.
That how it would get to its cobweb home
King Bruce could not divine.

It soon began to cling and crawl
Straight up with strong endeavor;
But down it came with a slippery sprawl,
As near to the ground as ever.

Up, up, it ran, not a second to stay,
To utter the least complaint;
Till it fell still lower, and there it lay,
A little dizzy and faint.

Its head grew steady—again it went,
And traveled a half yard higher;
'Twas a delicate thread it had to tread,
And a road where its feet would tire.

Again it fell and swung below,
But again it quickly mounted;
Till up and down, now fast, now slow,
Nine brave attempts were counted.

"Sure," cried the king, "that foolish thing
Will strive no more to climb;
When it toils so hard to reach and cling,
And tumbles every time."

But up the insect went once more,
Ah, me! 'tis an anxious minute;
He's only a foot from his cobweb door,
Oh, say! will he lose or win it?

Steadily, steadily, inch by inch,
Higher and higher he got;
And a bold little run at the very last pinch
Put him into his nativ cot.

"Bravo, bravo!" the king cried out;
"All honor to those who try;
The spider up there defied despair,
He conquered, and why shouldn't I?"

And Bruce of Scotland braced his mind,
And gossips tell the tale
That he tried once more as he tried before,
And that time did not fail.

Pay goodly heed, all ye who read,
And beware of saying, "I can't;"
'Tis a cowardly word, and apt to lead
To idleness, folly, and want.

Whenever you find your heart despair
Of doing some goodly thing,
Con over this strain, try bravely again,
And remember the spider and king.

A Prairie in May.

I wonder how many of the Eastern little folks ever saw a great prairie in May.

I know some of them hav not, and this beautiful May morning, I feel just like trying to make a word picture of one.

The one in this part of Indiana is known as the "Grand Prairie." Just east of us is a long strip of prairie land called the "Twenty Mile." But this Grand Prairie is rightly named. Some of our Eastern folk who are used to mountains, and rocks, and mighty waters, might not see the grandeur at first sight, but it is like Old Ocean, grand in its mighty vastness, beauty, and peacefulness. I hav seen the Atlantic at Cape May, and at Nantasket, when I said to my daughter, "How much it looks like one of our great Western prairies!" Now, as I sit at my window, I say to myself, "How like it is to the ocean!" The blue-grass meadows, and the emerald green of the wheat fields, as the wind plays upon the long, slender blades, appear so much like the swells of the sea; and the orchards, with their snowy blossoms, are the white-capped waves. The distant trees look like clouds, low down in the horizon, and the great farm-houses and barns can, by a stretch of the imagination, be converted into huge vessels lying at anchor, or lighthouses built upon rocks; the little white-covered creamery wagons, darting around from house to house, gathering up the cream, look like tiny sail-boats tacking about and dodging the larger vessels, while the newly broken ground appears like great sand bars.

Two-thirds of a mile south runs the Grand Trunk railroad, and is in plain sight for a clean stretch of more than two miles, and as it is made up of many lines of railroads, it has many colors of cars—red, yellow, green, blue, white, and brown; while some are green with great red shields painted on their sides, and others are red with white stars; but I cannot enumerate the many varieties, and as they go gliding along through the blue meadows and green fields, they remind one of some great sea serpent, panting, snorting, and spitting fire and steam.

In any direction you may look may be seen cattle (one involuntarily exclaims, "Cattle upon a thousand hills"), red, white, brown, dun and black; staid old cows, frisky, frolicsome calves, and bellowing, pawing bullocks. Then the horses and colts, the light-footed fellows, how they play and caper! Just across the road are three of them, "yearlin's," their owner would tell you; two are black, and one is what we used to call, when I was one of the little folks, "dapple gray." How their coats shine as they play "dare" in and out of the grove, adding life and picturesqueness to the scene!

Then the birds; oh, the birds! What a lot of them, and how glad they are to get back; and how busy they appear to be, hunting places for building nests! One bluebird awaked me every morning in April, tapping on my chamber window, trying to see if it could make a hole big enough to get in, but, he finally gave it up, so now I sleep in peace. I opened the window, but he thought he would not come in unless he could make his own door. Then there are the jays, robins, red-headed woodpeckers, blackbirds, meadow-larks, brown-thrushes, and snipes, all screaming and chattering at once, filling the air full of sound, song, and melody, while the mocking-bird, perched upon the highest tree in the neighborhood, almost sets the bird-world crazy with his mimicry and teasing. The Baltimore oriole, with his red and black plumage, and the wild canaries, with their soft, yellow browns and grays, and the red-winged blackbirds, and the bright golden-yellow hammers, and the little brown wrens, and the red-breasted robins, flitting in and out, among the maples, look like animated blossoms. Then, there are the white pigeons, great blue hawks, and high-stepping and noisy chanticleer, and the mother hen with her little downy chickens. Isn't there a lot of things, and little children, too, with their print dresses, and sun-bonnets, and the boys in their straw hats, now here, now there, hither and thither, into mischief, and out before we can catch them; getting hurt, and having fun; laughing and crying, apparently as aimless and thoughtless as the apple blossoms borne upon the wind; now gathering flowers, daisies, buttercups, violets, wild pansies, star-flowers, and dandelions; hands, hats, and aprons full, then flinging all away, and off, pell mell, after one of those living blossoms called butterflies! When all tired out, away they go to the barn, to swing, or roll in the hay, or lie idly on the floor, and watch the swallows building under the eaves; as wild and careless as the calves, colts, and birds.

There is so much room; so much clean, fresh, sweet-scented air; such long straight roads, with grass, knee deep, on both sides, all mosaicked with flowers; so much time to look at the farm-houses in sight, eighteen of them, not one nearer than half a mile, and some four miles away. Almost all hav a bell, and if one rings half an hour sooner than is its wont, how all who hear it speculate about it. Is some one sick? has a tramp frightened the women? or, has some one come? How we wonder why one neighbor turns under his sod, while another plants grass; why one plants trees and another cuts trees down—we can see it all going on, miles away, and wonder and gossip about it. It is like a great living, moving picture, with its emerald background, and its framing of oaks and maples.

And then, in the evening, how pleasant it is to sit and watch the cows go home, "long strings of them," as the children say! How soothing the far-away tinkle, tinkle, of the bells! How beautifully the foliage of the trees lights up under the reflection of the setting sun! How plaintiv the note of the ring-dove! How sharp and shrill "Bob White" peals forth his note! What a time "Whip-poorwill" is having, as he screams faster and faster, until, all out of breath, he is compelled to stop and gather himself together for a fresh start! But, mercy, mercy, there is no end to it all, so I will stop short off.

How I wish you could all enjoy it as I do, for I assure you it is a sweet and charming picture.

Wonders in Natural History.

A single female house-fly produces in one season 20,080,320 eggs. A wasp's nest usually contains 15,000 or 16,000 cells.

A queen bee will lay 2,000 eggs daily for 50 days, and the eggs are hatched in three days. A swarm of bees contains from 10,000 to 20,000 in a natural state; in a hive, from 30,000 to 40,000 bees.

Two thousand nine hundred silk worms are required to produce one pound of silk; but it takes 27,000 spiders to produce one pound of web.

Spiders hav four paps for spinning their threads, each pap having 1,000 holes, and the fine web itself is the union of 4,000 threads. No spider spins more than four webs, and when the fourth is destroyed they seize on the webs of other spiders.

The river Rhine carries to the sea every day 145,980 cubic feet of sand or stone.

Correspondence.

HARRISBURG, PA., June 12, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav taken a great interest in reading THE TRUTH SEEKER since you hav been editing the page for young folks, and I like the reading very much. I am fourteen years old. I am about through school now, as my parents cannot afford to send me any longer, but I hav a pretty fair knowledge of common school studies, and am going to learn a trade. My mother says I hav got a high temper. I licked a fellow yesterday, and made his nose bleed, but he made me mad; that's why I did it. My temper is all right, till I get mad. Yours respectfully,

JOHN BLISCO.

P.S.—How is my writing?

[Your penmanship does very well, and, what is better, your spelling and punctuation are correct. But you must try and control that high temper as much as possible, or it may sometime lead you into difficulty. "He that ruleth his own spirit is greater than he who taketh a city."—ED. BEES! BEES! BEES!

FROM $2,000 TO $5,000 A YEAR KEEPING HONEY BEES.

The particulars are simply to prevent the great loss that most bee masters have to contend with annually. Then give the bees a chance to increase and collect surplus honey to their fullest capacity; all of which can be easily accomplished by using the kind of hive described in "Kidder's Secrets of Bee-keeping."

Send for the Book and see how easily it can be done with a few swarms of bees.

THIS BOOK IS A RELIABLE GUIDE

to all persons that keep bees, especially to the novice or new beginner, as it teaches how all of the troubles and disappointments that the bee master is liable to, can be successfully overcome, such as Foul Brood, Dysentery, Bee Robbery, Ravages of Moth Millers, Loss of Queen, loss of bees in Swarming time, by their flight to the forests, also the great loss in winter and early spring management, which is usually more than all other ways combined. This book will also inform the bee master HOW BEES WILL INCREASE AND THROW OFF SWARMS to an enormous extent, all conditions being favorable. The old stocks will frequently swarm three or four times each, and oft times the first swarms thrown off will swarm once or twice each, with a good hive and right kind of management. In warmer climates the bees will increase and swarm to a much greater extent.

GREAT YIELD OF SURPLUS HONEY.

This Book will inform the bee master how to get the greatest amount of surplus honey, and at the same time have it in small packages weighing three-quarters of a pound to two or three pounds, as may be desired, which will command the highest price in market. In a good season the bee keeper may calculate on two or three hundred pounds of surplus honey from each old stock, and from fifty to one hundred pounds from the earlier young swarms, especially if they do not over-swarm.

NO MORE BEE-STINGS IN MANAGING BEES.

The Book will post the bee-keepers how to manage them when putting them on, or taking off surplus honey boxes, and not get stung in the whole operation.

BEE-KEEPING FOR OUR SONS AND DAUGHTERS.

It being the most pleasant, as well as the most profitable business that young people can engage in, and at the same time remain at home with their parents. The author has known of several young men who commenced the culture of the bee in their teens, and are now making more money than their fathers who run the farm, and doing it easily and with small investments. We must also remember that the women folks often make the best of bee-keepers, and not so liable to neglect them as the men folks.

KIDDER'S BEE BOOK

should be in the hands of all persons who like honey, and take an interest in the little honey bee. It contains more matter than many books that sell for two dollars, and is embellished with numerous cuts and drawings. There is no trouble, loss, or damage that a bee master has to contend with but what the book will give the proper remedy by simply referring to the index, and that will point to the page where it is fully explained.

In order to bring this book more prominently before the mass of bee keepers, the Author proposes to give, as a premium to each purchaser of a book, from this date until July next, the privilege of making his Celebrated Patent Bee Hive, as spoken of in book, for their own use (but not to sell) Free of Charge, otherwise there will be the usual Patent Fee of Five Dollars to each individual that wishes to make and use the hive

PRICE, BOARD BOUND, 75 cents; CLOTH, 85 cents.

N. B. The directions for hive making with cuts, drawings, etc., will be inclosed within each book sold, until July next, (not longer). Now is the time for all bee-keepers to avail themselves of this liberal offer, which is simply to buy a book at the Regular Price, before July next

BIBLE MYTHS

Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly attempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

Poetry.

The Death of Ahab, Homerized.

1 Kings xxii.

Attend, ye powers, at your dread sovereign's call;
Ahab at Ramath Gilead must fall,
So we decree. Now let the courier speed
With falsehood fired to consummate the deed.
So shall our righteous vengeance be appeased,
When death's cold hand the recreant wretch has seized.
The courier sped at dread Jehovah's nod,
Approached the earth, concealing all the God.
The holy prophets saw, at once they knew
(A cloud concealed him from the vulgar view),
But hoary-headed Micaiah alone
Received an adverse message from the throne.
Now two huge antlers Zedekiah brings,
And straight approached the throne, where sat the kings.
"O king," he said, and raised the antlers high above his head,
Then in the solid ground he plunged with force.
The earthy fragments flew along the course.
So shall thy sword thy timorous foes disperse.
"'Tis God's decree, his message I rehearse."
Israel's vain king by God's decree misled,
Urged on the fight and in the conflict bled.
His chariot left the field for him too late,
The perfidy of God had sealed his fate.
When gods essay their vengeful spite to try,
Priests, kings, and people in one carnage lie.

Brooklyn, N. Y. N. SAWYER.

A Gospel Temperance Orator Off Duty.

The following appeared in a recent issue of the New York Sun. The description of the "noticeable gentleman" fits the Rev. Mr. Sawyer, who conducts religious revivals under the name of gospel temperance meetings at the Cooper Institute in this city:

A GENTLEMAN PRACTICALLY DEMONSTRATES HIS IDEA OF SIN.

A gentleman of fine physical presence sat in Mouquin's restaurant in Fulton street at six o'clock last evening. Other diners could not help noticing him, although he sat well toward one end of the long room, and enjoyed such further seclusion as was afforded by a screen set against the wall on the side of the table toward which he faced. A companion, florid-faced, with shortly cropped black hair and side whiskers, sat with his back to the screen, and gave orders glibly to the waiters in French. He also spoke fluently to the head waiter in German. With his large, noticeable companion he spoke easy, idiomatic English.

A quart bottle of red wine and a jug of seltzer stood on the table in addition to one or two excellent dishes.

Several in the room seemed to recognize the noticeable gentleman, but no salutations were passed. He kept his face steadily toward the screen. He wore a Prince Albert coat buttoned high up about his sturdy body. His shoulders looked three feet across, and an observer would say that it would take a four-foot tape measure to encircle his chest. His head was small and round above the ears; his dark hair was closely cropped, and he was slightly bald just about the crown. His face was longish and benevolent looking, in spite of its square jaws. His moustache was especially peculiar. It was heavy and brown, with a definit broad patch of creamy white just to one side of the center.

A second quart bottle of red wine was set upon the table.

The noticeable gentleman employed strong American idioms in his conversation, such as, "It is A1, I can tell you." He drank his full share of the wine. In fact, he never allowed the beverage to rest for half a minute in his glass. The instant his companion poured it, which he did with reasonable industry, adding a trifle of seltzer each time—presto!—the noticeable gentleman shot it into his interior like a flash. He was alert, and he got considerably more than half of the two fat bottles that were set upon the table between the hours of six and seven.

At seven the waiter brought two long tapering glasses filled with cracked ice. A minute later the cork flew with a hilarious sound from a frosty bottle, and the slender glasses were filled with champagne. The champagne was all consumed.

Shortly before eight three new comers entered by the Ann street door. They all recognized the noticeable gentleman, who rose flushed and pleasantly jovial. One of them said to him:

"Are you off to your gospel temperance meeting?"

"No," he replied; "we are shut up until the fall for repairs."

After that time the temperance meetings which he conducts, which are widely known and popular, and in which he urges total abstinence, will be continued as usual.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library. Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,

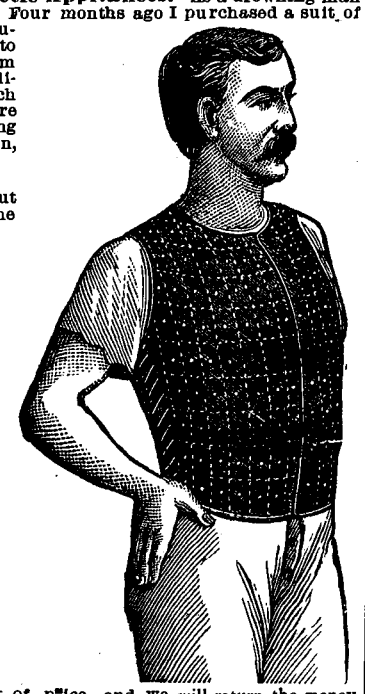
Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by any one desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove. He has for twenty years treated exclusivly all diseases of the Sexual Organs, in which he stands pre-eminent. Gems of Thought.

PUT away thy sorrows as soon and as quietly as thou canst. Though many may feel sympathy and pity, few hav much interest in hearing of others' afflictions. The chronic invalid is too prone to inflict upon friends long accounts of the aches and pains that rack the tortured frame, not realizing that the listener is generally bored rather than interested, while his own sufferings are multipled by the repetition of them. A semblance of cheerfulness, if but merely to make it pleasant for a friend, will often react upon one's own feelings and create the very happiness thus simulated.—Elmina D. Slenker.

SCIENTIFIC men who hav conducted the battle on behalf of the less crude opinions hav generally been influenced by religious aspiration quite as strongly as the apologists of the more crude opinions, and so far from religious feeling being weakened by their perennial series of victories, it has apparently been growing deeper and stronger all the time. The religious sense is as yet too feebly developed in most of us; but certainly, in no preceding age, hav men taken up the work of life with more earnestness, or with more real faith in the unseen, than at the present day, when so much of what was considered all-important has been consigned to the limbo of mythology.—John Fiske's Unseen World.

IF I see anything, I do see this—that the element of humanity, respect for intelligence, reverence for knowledge, belief in the power of sympathy and kindness, the resurrection of the human conscience, faith in the power of human achievements, is growing, is spreading. Help it grow. Help it spread. We shall find that there is not an evil which we can not easily remove; not a burden that we cannot lift; not a mischief settled upon us in America which, when we will, we cannot break away like dust. It is so; all that is necessary is that we should feel that the human nature in us is coming to its rights. And then the angels will sing their ancient song once more, but they will sing it in our own hearts, and they will not only make the promis of "peace and good will," but they will fulfil it.—Frothingham's Song of Christmas.

MEN will wrangle for religion, write for it, fight for it, die for it—anything but liv for it.—Colton's Lacon.

HIS unhappy end has cast its shadow over Christ's life. He has been continually spoken of as "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." There is no reason to suppose that in any special sense he corresponded to the prophetic picture. Undoubtedly he had his sorrows; undoubtedly he was acquainted with grief. But unless there had been in his private life some tragedy of which we are not informed, these sorrows were not of the bitterest, nor was the grief of the deepest. There is, no doubt, in his language a tinge of that sadness which all great natures, who are not in harmony with their age, must needs experience. He believed that he had great truths to tell, and he found his countrymen unwilling to receive them. Here was one source of unhappiness; and another he had, in common with all who are deeply conscious of the miseries of human existence. But in no special or transcendent sense can he be called a man of sorrows or acquainted with grief. So far as our evidence goes, he was exempt from the terrible calamities that befall mankind. Free from all earthly ties but those of friendship with his chosen companions, he was not exposed to many of the anxieties and trials which afflict men—ordinary men. Dying young, he did not suffer (so far as we know) from any serious illness, nor from the troubles, both physical and mental, that scarcely ever fail to beset a longer life. Bereavement, the most terrible of human ills, never afflicted him.—Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief.

Please cut this petition out, attach it to a blank sheet of paper, sign your name and address to it, get all your friends and neighbors to do the same, and then send it to this office.

A PETITION FOR STATE SECULARIZATION.

To the Honorable Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress:

A republican form of government being based on liberty, equality, and fraternity, as both means and end, involves the separation of Church and State, whose union is the worst form of class-legislation and the most infallible sign of arbitrary power. A house divided against itself cannot stand. The institutions of this Commonwealth should be made homogeneous throughout. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of truth in whatever direction. Any infringement by government of this absolute equality of its citizens is the parent of manifold evil, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, this government was founded to "establish."

And yet, though the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," there does exist a union of Church and State, which gives to Christianity moral and material aid, and so proscribes other religions and forms of belief and unbelief, while taxing these also for the support of that special religion.

The ways in which this old alliance between Church and State still survives among us are:

1. Recognition of God and Christianity in State Constitutions.
2. Exemption of Church property from taxation.
3. Appropriations of public money for sectarian purposes.
4. Religious exercises, as the reading of the Bible, etc., in the public schools.
5. Laws enforcing the observance of the Sabbath on the authority of the Bible.
6. Religious test-oaths in courts of justice and on instalment into office.
7. Chaplaincies in the Legislature, the Army, and the Navy.
8. Fast and Thanksgiving Proclamations, which contain theological ideas that may or may not be acceptable to the citizen.

The necessity for this separation of Church and State is more apparent now than ever before, because of the still greater diversity of religious beliefs, the many forms of dissent from the religion which receives State patronage, and the growing signs of sectarian strife and ambition in the arena of politics. And emphasis needs to be given to the fact that the union of Church and State is a great hindrance to the employment of right methods in dealing with many questions of reform now demanding attention. And most essential is it at all times, and especially in the present, in order to secure for the law its due respect and observance, that the people's representatives should exhibit the strictest fidelity to their trusts by following the law in its letter and spirit.

Your petitioners, therefore, pray that immediate action be taken by the law-making power to bring into harmony the theory and practice of our government in making the following principle a part of the fundamental law of the land by amendment to the United States Constitution:

The total separation of Church and State, by prohibiting Congress or any State, County, Municipality, or Township from enacting any law that favors religion in any of the eight ways specified, or in any other way, or prohibits the free exercise thereof.

Odds and Ends.

NO woman should borrow the husband of another, because it is not good for man to be a loan.

A YOUNG man writes to consult us about the best pattern of health lift. We would suggest helping his mother a little with the coal hod.

THE garden season is here, and the husband of the woman who throws-stones-at-the-hens is getting himself into a position to dodge.

WHAT resemblance is there between kind words and the bald-headed? Kind words can never die, and the bald-headed can never dye, either.

IT is not generally known that Tennyson, in his early life, was a grain speculator. In his "Locksley Hall," he tells us that he "dipped into the 'future.'"

AN amateur punster informs us that some houses hav wings, and that he has often seen a house fly. We thought that no part of a house save the chimney flue.

"I WISH I was a saloon," said a loving woman to her husband. "Why?" he inquired, with some degree of surprise. "Oh, because you'd run in eighteen or twenty times a day to see me."

FOGG says he doesn't believe it pays in the end to get your landlord to make extensiv repairs. Putting new wood into an old building is like putting new cloth into an old raiment. The rent is made worse.

"PAPA, what is the tariff?" asked a congressman's little boy. Gazing compassionately at the youthful knowledge seeker, and sadly shaking his head, the father replied: "My son, I cannot tell a lie; I do not know."

A MERCHANT who died suddenly, not long ago, left on his desk a letter he had intended mailing to a correspondent. An Irish clerk, finding it, sent it off after adding the postscript: "Since writing the above I hav died."

"YOU seem to feel unusually well this morning," said an imp of darkness to his satanic majesty. "Yes, indeed," responded the old sinner, flicking his tail playfully. "I hav just heard some good news." "What is that?" "Bob Ingersoll is lecturing again."

A GENTLEMAN in Richmond, Va., had a servant named Joe. One morning he lay in bed till nine o'clock, but no Joe, and no fire. The impossibility of shaving with water thirty degrees below freezing-point brought imprecations on the tardy domestic's head, when the door opened and Aunt Polly leisurely began to light the fire. "Where in thunder (the historian is nothing if he is not accurate) is that son of yours? I've been waiting for him two blessed hours." "Now, Marse Tray, you must 'cuse Joe," said his mother in her most conciliating tones, "you really must 'cuse Joe dis mornin'—Joe's dead."

A COUPLE of practical jokers living at a big uptown hotel bought a terrapin while walking through the market the other day, and slipped it into the bed of a fresh arrival who had just registered. They watched that night until they saw the newcomer retire to bed. In a few minutes a white-robed figure began shouting down the elevator shaft for the landlord. When the crowd got up stairs, the victim conducted the landlord to the bed, and turned down the clothes. "Mister Hotel Keeper," said the stranger, solemnly pointing to the terrapin, "I'm from New Jersey, and I can stand most anything, but either that bug or me has got to take another room."

A PASTOR'S POINTED ANNOTATION.

The London Christian World prints the following guide to the service, lately handed to the English minister in whose pulpit he was to preach. The order was partly printed and partly written—the written part being the annotation of the pastor of the church, who had suffered much from the unwritten order of service observed by the choir and the congregation:

Order—Evening Service.

I.—Ballooning by the choir. II.—Scriptures read reverently by the clergyman. III.—Hymn. (Congregational). IV.—Prayer. (Minister all alone, and congregation meanwhile wool-gathering.) V.—Gloria. (Further ballooning by the choir all alone among clerestory windows, roof, etc.) VI.—Sermon. VII.—Hymn. (Congregational.) VIII.—Prayer. (Minister all alone, congregation wool-gathering, putting on gloves, getting couchant ready to spring.) IX.—Benediction. (Violent stampede while organ moves off, sky-rocketing and turning handsprings like a drunken Bacchante.) X.—Silence and darkness, and the restored presence of God!

A CALLOW young man,
Of the good, goody sort,
Thought a pretty maid to wed,
And though he strove to win her love,
Strove not to win his bread.

When her sweet eyes looked into his,
His heart went a flip-a-flopping,
And pent-up love would bubble up,
He knew no way of stopping.

"Alphonso, dear," the maiden asked,
"Where'll come our bread and butter?"
He quickly drew her to his side
And whispered: "If you'll be my bride
We'll trust the Lord for daily bread,
And Deacon G—'ll trust us for butter."

ASSISTANT SUPERINTENDENT MILLS called on one of the younger classes in the Sixth ward school to see how they were getting along in geography. As the lesson progressed, he asked: "Now if I were to bore a hole down through the center of the earth, where would I find myself?" One of the children eagerly shook her hand for recognition. "Now, where would I be?" asked the professor calling on the child. "You would be in—in—the bad place!" she shouted at the top of her voice. The professor was considerably shocked at the answer, but satisfied himself with saying, "You are away off—sit down."

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 11. No. 27. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, July 5, 1884. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

ELDER THOMAS SMITH, of the Christian church, Baltimore, is under the cloud of expulsion for abstracting a $1 bill from the contribution plate he was passing.

A GOAT got into an orthodox Brooklyn church the other day and ate the manuscript of the minister's sermon. The animal had got fat eating tin cans and circus posters, but the sermon burnt out the interior of his stomach and he died in great pain.

THE Rev. Ralph E. Macduff, pastor of St. Mary's church, Cleveland, has been arrested for riding a bicycle on the sikewalk, and fined and reprimanded in the police court. It is evidently the opinion of the court that the Lord's chariot is not a bicycle.

A WASHINGTON lawyer has unearthed an old law, still in force in the District of Columbia, which provides that any man who blasphemes the Almighty God by using profane language shall be branded on the tongue with a hot iron. The law was enacted about 1805. It has never been repealed.

WHY was Noah the best broker of ancient times? He could float more stock than any other man.—Puck. And had the entire stock market under his control.—Boston Post. With unexampled facilities for watering it.—Philadelphia Call. After the flood, it will be remembered, he was not so much a "bull" as bare.

A PRIVATE dispatch received in Boston by the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions, dated Hong Kong, June 21st, announces the total loss of the missionary brig Morning Star at Kusaie. All on board were saved, and are en route to San Francisco by the steamer Oceanic. This is the third missionary ship of the same name lost in Micronesia.

THE Rev. Wardlaw Thompson, the traveling secretary of the London Missionary Society, reports that in all the tribes of south Africa bad brandy is the greatest curse of the nativs. Half the chiefs of Basutoland hav a "still" on most of the time. The brandy keg, he finds, does more damage than the powder barrel. Much the same is the truth about the inhabitants of places nearer than South Africa.

"LEMONS are remarkably cheap this year," said the Sunday-school superintendent to the deacon, while they were making arrangements for the annual Sunday-school picnic. "So I hear," answered the deacon; "but why do you mention it?" "I was thinking," said the superintendent, musingly, "seeing they're so cheap, that it wouldn't be a bad thing to make a new departure at the picnic this year, and put some in the lemonade."

AT the Clonmel (Ireland) Petty Sessions recently two women were prosecuted for having burnt a child three years old by placing him naked on a hot shovel. The act was the result of gross superstition on their part, the two women alleging that he was an old man left by the fairies as a substitute for a real child they had taken from its mother. The charge was proved against one of the women, and she was sentenced to a week's imprisonment.

IF the following, from the Boston Congregationalist, shall hav the effect of undeceiving any as to the popular folly known as "faith cure," then the publication of that sheet will not hav been, as it has hitherto appeared, altogether in vain. Says that paper: "Not all the cases of alleged healing by means of 'Christian science' or 'faith' will bear examination. We know of one instance, at least, and hav reason to suppose that there are multitudes of others, where the last condition of the patient was worse than the first. The artificial strength excited by an imagined cure sometimes bears a resemblance to genuin vital force, but the reaction, sure to follow in many cases, reveals its true character. There may be individuals who hav been permanently cured by this mode of treatment, but we hav never chanced to see one, while we can testify of its failure."

MR. P. RYAN owns the Sunnyside Base Ball Grounds, at Long Island City, N. Y. He permits ball playing on Sunday. Last Sunday the police appeared and announced that the first man who ventured to touch a ball would be arrested. Thereupon Mr. Ryan picked up a bat and sent a ball whizzing through the air. He was arrested and held in $100 bail, charged with breaking the Sunday laws. He will make this a test case to see whether a man has a right to play ball Sunday on his own premises.

MR. CHESTER A. ARTHUR was approached in New York by a curly-headed flower girl, two feet high, who said, "Buy a bouquet, mister?" The president bought a bouquet of forget-me-nots, and put them in his buttonhole. He offered the miniature vender a silver coin and a kiss on the cheek, and she took them both sedately. About the same time Gen. Grant and Gen. Sheridan were kissing a dozen little girls in white gowns in another part of the city. Gen. Sherman was also kissing ladies in Washington.—Ex.

IT is the opinion of the American Literary Churchman that the effect of Heber Newton's lectures will be "to produce the conviction that we know next to nothing about the real meaning of the Pentateuch; that its biographies are incredible; and, above all, that it contains the record of no divine revelations, but only a confused account of the natural evolution of religious feeling and speculation which had taken place through long and very remote periods, and which is here presented in the form of a history almost wholly imaginary and ideal."

AT St. John's M. E. church, Bedford avenue, Brooklyn, last Sunday morning, the Rev. W. L. Phillips took for his subject, "Heathen at Home." "Come with me," he said, "to the dark places of a large city, and I will show you an amount of ignorance, debauchery, and a lack of moral distinction that can hardly be surpassed, if, indeed, it is matched, by heathendom. Look at the dark places that exist at your very feet before you giv money to foreign missions. Illuminate these dark corners of so-called Christian lands before you turn your attention to heathen ones."

"MY dear friend," said the minister approaching the bedside, "are you aware that your lease of life is very short?" "I—I am afraid it is," the sick man replied; "the physician says there is no hope for me, does he not?" "Yes, he informs me that you are rapidly nearing your end, and I come to offer you the consolation which religion alone can giv." "You are very kind," the sick man responded gratefully, "I fear that my life has not been all that it should hav been in that respect. I shall be very glad to talk with you, but"—and here he spoke very earnestly—"I wish you wouldn't say anything to anybody just yet, in regard to my seeking the consolation of religion. I may possibly recover after all, you know."

A WRITER in the Pall Mall Gazette givs an account of an interview which he had with Cumberland, the professed exposer of Spiritual mediums. Whether Cumberland is a medium in disguise, or a man who is enabled to duplicate genuin Spiritual phenomena, probably no one but himself knows. The writer says: "I happened, in the course of our conversation, to ask Mr. Cumberland whether he was an able spirit-rapper. In a moment mysterious rappings were heard from all parts of the room, as if in reply to the question. 'You see,' said Mr. Cumberland, 'I can produce all sorts of knocks and cries, from the still small voice of the infant in the celestial regions to the sepulchral tones of the tormented spirit, whose unearthly groans are so effectiv. I get the still small voice by dislocation of the thumb,' and the still small voice spoke in its most melodious tones. 'The sepulchral tones come by a displacement of the knee-joint—so—' and the sepulchral tones reverberated through the room. 'The peronius longus I can now easily work, as you hear, although I hav a pair of thick boots on.' It was very easily worked, and effectually."

THE Canadian Methodists are as intolerant as the followers of Wesley in this country. At the recent conference held at Toronto a report was adopted protesting against the running of trains, ferries, street cars, or printing-presses on Sunday, and Sunday funerals with parades, and all Sunday parades and marches. The committee also expressed regret that in the construction of the Canadian Pacific railroad those in authority permitted the continuance of work on Sundays. They suggested the appointment of a commission of three ministers and three laymen to confer with the Dominion goverment for the enactment of laws carrying out the wishes of the conference. The report was adopted. During the discussion the Salvation Army parades were denounced as an intolerable nuisance.

"THERE is something unutterably pathetic," remarks the Mercury, "in the fate of Two Standing, a noted brave of the Omaha tribe, who died in one of our city hospitals last week, and was buried in Potter's Field. His name was a decoration won by personal valor, he and another warrior being the only two left standing at the close of a desperate battle in which a party of Sioux were defeated. He came to New York with a show troupe, and being taken sick was abandoned to his fate. Alone and among strangers, he passed away to the happy hunting-grounds of his fathers, and the red warrior found no white man to giv him a burial worthy of his deeds and name. He was only an Indian—a vagabond in the land where his fathers had been kings." Here is an appropriate text for Father John Beeson, the red man's friend

THE Christian Register says: "The Presbyterian General Assembly, which recently met at Saratoga, passed resolutions against Sunday papers, Sunday trains, and Sunday mails. Before considering the effect of these resolutions upon the United States government and the people at large, it is pertinent to ask what will be their effect upon Presbyterians themselvs? Are Presbyterian business men the country over willing to giv up their Monday morning mail for the sake of stopping the trains which carried it on Sunday? Are Presbyterian stockholders in American railroads willing to giv up the dividends which come from Sunday travel, or to sell out their stocks in roads which run trains on that day? And are Presbyterians willing also to giv up their Monday papers, because Sunday must be devoted to their preparation? When our Presbyterian brethren can enforce these resolutions in their own household, their example will hav more effect upon public opinion than their declarations."

THE new Dominican monastery in Newark, N. J., has been visited by thousands and inspected with a curious interest. The monastery is a gloomy, square, plain, Gothic structure of rough brown-stone. It has no ornamentation whatever, and is said by the architect to be a copy of monasteries of the same order in the Old World. The cells of the monastery contain only a bed, a chair, and a table, with a brown-stone pitcher and a basin. They are each 8x10 feet, and hav for beds wooden tables, covered with a tick containing a little straw. The prioress of the house was formerly known as Miss Julia Crooks. Night and day two nuns kneel constantly before the "host." They all rise at midnight and pray for two hours. They then return to bed and sleep until 5:30 o'clock, when they rise and engage in prayer in their cells. At 6 o'clock they go to the chapel for private prayer and to assist in the mass. At 8 o'clock a little coffee and bread are partaken of, and from 8:30 to 10:30 the nuns work in the community-room. Devotions follow till 11 o'clock, when a plain dinner is eaten. Meat is never eaten. From dinner the nuns go to the cloister or garden for recreation. Except at this time there is no conversation in the house save such talk in undertones as may be absolutely necessary. There are now in the monastery fifteen full nuns, who wear a white habit and a black veil; six lay sisters, who wear white habits and veils and black aprons, and ten postulants who dress in black.

Facts and Fallacies in Regard to the New Testament.

Heaven, as it really is, according to the New Testament, is rarely spoken of. For lack of any scripture that describes heaven or even intimates it is in any sense a desirable abode for saints, priests and parsons quote: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hav entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him" (1 Cor. ii, 9). This text they wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction, perverting it from its plain and obvious purport, so as to make it seem to sustain their creed and dogmas.

Reading the context will convince any one that there is not even an allusion made to heaven as the reward of the saints. Both Paul and Isaiah, whom he quotes (Isa. lxiv, 4), refer only to the advantages resulting from faith in this present life. The very next sentence proves this—"But God hath revealed them unto us by his spirit." "Now we hav received not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God, that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God, which things also we speak" (12, 13). The first approach to anything like a description of heaven in the New Testament is found in Hebrews viii, 1–5, and is as unlike the heaven preached and promised to us as it is possible to conceive. "Now of the things which we hav spoken this is the sum: We hav such a high priest who is set on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man. For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices; wherefore it is of necessity that this man hav somewhat also to offer. For if he were on earth he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law; who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for see, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount."

We are told heaven is where God and Christ now dwell. The New Testament declares Christ is in the true sanctuary, of which that made by Moses was an exact copy. There are any number of texts to prove the exact whereabouts of Christ. "We hav such a high priest who is set on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heavens" (Heb. viii, 1). "Which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places" (Eph. i, 20). "Seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God" (Col. iii, 1). "Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God" (1 Peter, iii, 22). Paul affirms that Christ is now officiating as high priest in the real sanctuary in heaven. After describing the sanctuary of Moses, he declares, "But into the second went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself and for the errors of the people." But Christ being come, a high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building. Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us" (Heb. ix, 7, 12). "And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission. It was therefore necessary that the patterns* of things in the heavens should be purified† with these, but the heavenly things themselvs with better sacrifices than these" (Heb. ix, 23). Reader, make a note of this text. No error of translators here.

The New Testament asserts that heaven, where God himself dwells, needed cleansing to be rendered pure, and that Christ had to take his own blood to heaven with him to cleanse the true sanctuary. "And almost all things are by the law purged with blood, and without shedding of blood is no remission" (Heb. ix, 22). "We hav such a high priest who is set on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heavens. A minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man. For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices; wherefore it is of necessity that the man hav somewhat also to offer" (Heb. viii, 1, 3). "But Christ being come, a high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building. Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place" (Heb. ix, 11, 12). Where did Christ obtain the blood to do this? There is no account in the New Testament that Christ ever shed his blood.

Christ talked about making the sacrifice—is said to hav left his abode in glory and came down on earth for the sole purpose to shed his blood to take away the sins of the world. But according to the positiv and unmistakable testimony of the New Testament, when the time came—in the hour of trial—Christ's heart utterly failed him—he lost all hope or faith in a resurrection, lost all faith and trust in God—and died in the anguish of despair, with his dying breath reproaching his father, God, for having forsaken him; and the record is that he died without shedding his blood at all.

We hear a great deal about the precious blood of Jesus shed on Calvary. It is the pet theme of pulpit and hymn book.

> "There is a fountain filled with blood, > Drawn from Immanuel's veins."

(Fanatics' imagination-vein is the only authority for such an idea). "Jesus on the cross; for me a sinner bled." "His precious blood was shed for me." "He who intercedes above, who shed his blood on Calvary." "Washed in the blood of Jesus," etc., etc.—ad absurdum, ad nauseam.

Christians partaking of the Lord's Supper declare the bread and wine represent Christ's broken body and spilled blood. Christ's body never was broken. Christ's blood never was shed or spilled.

Luke says: "And he took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them saying: This is my body which is given for you; this do in remembrance of me. Likewise, also, the cup after supper, saying: This cup is the New Testament in my blood which is shed* for you" (Luke xxii, 19, 20).

The Apostle Paul declares: "For I hav received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you, That the Lord Jesus, the same night in which he was betrayed, took bread, And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat; this is my body, which is broken for you" (1 Cor. xi, 23, 24). (Is broken, is omitted in the revised revision, but a foot says: "Many ancient authorities read, is broken for you.")

Now examin the account of the crucifixion by the four evangelists, and ascertain the facts. Matthew says no word of piercing his side, givs no faintest intimation that there was any blood shed or spilt, nor any breaking of his body. Mark seems equally oblivious, givs no hint of anything of the kind. Luke, so precise in narrating all the incidents of the crucifixion, knew nothing about any shedding of blood or broken body. John alone makes any reference to either, and he denies that Christ shed his blood, or that his bones were broken. He declares it was "after Christ was dead" that one of the soldiers pierced his side. "But when they came to Jesus and saw that he was dead already, they break not his legs. But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came there out blood and water" (John xix, 32, 33).

It is ridiculous to talk of the wondrous love of Jesus who shed his blood for us—after he was dead. But the writer of the so-called gospel of John seems to hav realized his story of blood and water coming out of a dead man was a severe tax on human credulity, and so tries to fortify his assertion by declaring he was not lying. "And he that saw it bare record, and his record is true; and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye might believe" (verse 35). It is, to say the least, very suspicious when persons defend their character before it is attacked. If, in a company of supposed reputable people, we should lose our pocketbook and on stating the fact, one cries out, "I did not steal it," we should look no further for the thief.

Even John Wesley admits this was a great miracle and mystery. He says: "Forthwith there came out blood and water. It was strange, seeing he was dead, that blood should come out; more strange, that water also; and most strange of all, that both should come out immediately at one time, and yet distinctly" (John Wesley's Notes on New Testament, John xix, 34).

When any of the evangelists make incredible statements, they declare it was "that the scripture might be fulfilled," and in no instance does the scripture referred to hav the least reference or allusion to Christ. John, after declaring he was not lying, backs up his assertion by the pretense of fulfilment of prophecy. "For these things were done that the scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken" (John xix, 36). We are referred to Ex. xii, 46; Num. ix, 12; Psalms xxxiv, 20.

Abundance of evidence, three good texts. What more could be desired? Surely this is proof enough! Yes. But suppose instead of taking it for granted, we turn and read, and examin the proof offered. "In one house shall it be eaten; thou shalt not carry forth aught of the flesh abroad out of the house; neither shall ye break a bone thereof" (Ex. xii, 46). "They shall leave none of it unto the morning, nor break any bone of it; according to all the ordinances of the passover they shall keep it" (Num. ix, 12).

Do these texts refer to, are they in any sense prophecies of Christ? Were they fulfilled by blood and water coming out of his side after he was dead? These texts refer to the lamb of the passover. If the lamb died from fright before its blood was shed, it would be unclean, and could not be offered. There is no parallel between the slaying of the paschal lamb, and the crucifixion of Christ. The lamb was bled to death; died by pouring out his blood. Christ did not die from loss of blood; his blood was not poured out.

The third text reads, "He keepeth all his bones; not one of them is broken" (Psalms xxxiv, 20). How easily are we deceived by trusting in priests and parsons! Read the context and see if this text refers to Christ. The very next verse says: "Evil shall slay the wicked, and they that hate the righteous shall be desolate." If it is true, as is alleged, that verse twenty was a prophecy of Christ, and was fulfilled at his crucifixion, then it proves that Christ was slain because he was wicked, and God forsook him—left him desolate because Christ hated his neighbors. Where, oh, where! is the fountain of blood drawn from Immanuel's veins? We are told "he did shed his blood. Luke says he did, in the garden of Gethsemane." What does Luke say? "And being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly, and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground" (Luke xxii, 44). It does not say he sweat blood, but his sweat was like clots of blood. The original reads:

> HIDROS HAUTOU HOSI* THROMBOS AIUATOS.
> Sweat of him like clots of blood.

But the absurdity of this claim is best shown by the context. This claimed shedding his blood was when he was praying that he might not die; that he might be spared from making the sacrifice. The equally silly subterfuge that he shed his blood from his hands and feet, by which he was nailed to the cross, is contrary to facts, common sense, and the highest and best accredited Christian authorities.

"Was watched, according to custom, by a party of four soldiers, with their centurian, whose express office was to prevent the stealing of the body. This was necessary from the lingering character of the death, which sometimes did not supervene even for three days, and was at last the result of gradual benumbing and starvation" (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, Article, Crucifixion).

Instead of suffering as never man suffered, the very reverse is the truth. There is no record of any other ever dying by crucifixion so quickly.

Reader, ask yourself if you would accept as sacred truth such evidences, and be horrified at the exposure of such deceptions, if they all related to Brahma, Christna, Mohammed, or Joe Smith? Is it wrong to expose the fallacies and absurdities of the Hindoos, the Chinese, the Turks; to dispel their reverence for the gods their fathers hav for generations worshiped? Before proceeding to examin the reality of heaven, and of what the sanctuary consists which has to be purified and cleansed with the blood of Jesus, we hav a few questions for priests, parsons, and Sunday-school teachers, and suggest that honest Christians should demand and insist on having honest answers.

If Christ was God, how could he die—cease to exist—and another God no more powerful than himself resurrect him? If Christ's body only died, and his soul continued to liv, why did he not resurrect himself? If Christ's body only died, how could the death of his body pay the penalty of man's sin, when the Bible declares, "The soul that sinneth it shall die?" (Ezek. xviii, 4). How could a God, coequal with the Almighty, hav prayed in the garden of Gethsemane, "If it be possible, let this cup pass?" If Christ was God, coequal with the father, did he not know if it were possible or not? Could Christ be God, equal with the father, yet not be omniscient? Is not knowledge, of all things, an essential quality of a God? Would a God suffer such agony of fear at the mere thought of death as to sweat as it were great drops of blood? Was it godlike to be terrified at making the atonement, which, it is alleged, he and his father had agreed on since the foundation of the world, and which he left the high courts of heaven, and took upon himself our humanity, especially to make? Was it amazing love to pray the cup might pass, desiring that all mankind should be damned rather than he should suffer for three hours on the cross, knowing that in less than three days he would be alive again, and become the prince of glory, and dwell in heaven adored by all the saints and angels for all eternity? If Christ was God, or equal with God, why did he need the help of an angel to giv him strength (Luke xxii, 42, 44)? If Christ was God, how comes it he disbelieved his own assertions, was false to his own teaching, gave evidence of his own utter lack of hope or faith in God? Were not his dying words, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?"—a reproach? Could he hav uttered those words if he had believed the scriptures—"For the Lord loveth judgment and forsaketh not his saints?" (Psalms xxxvii, 28.) Did not this same Christ declare, "He that believeth not shall be damned?" (Mark xvi, 16.)

We ask these questions in all sincerity. They must be admitted worthy of earnest thought. And

*Pattern (Gr. Hypodigma, an image, effigy, copy corresponding to an original).

†Purified (Gr. Katharizo, to cleanse, to render pure).

*Shed (Gr. Ekkeuno), to pour out, gush out, to giv largely.

Hosi*, just as if, as it were something like.

if once honest Christians begin to think, faith dies. When reason reigns, superstition abdicates. In the language of the noble model truth seeker, D. M. Bennett, "Oh, for a revival of reason, truth, and common sense!" CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

Infidel Philosophy.

Ex. xvii, 16: "The Lord hath sworn that the Lord will hav war with Amalek from generation to generation." If God was bound to exterminate this people, would not common humanity dictate that it should be done at once and without suffering? If he had the power to engulf Pharaoh's hosts in the Red Sea, he had the power to giv them a sudden and painless death. Why pursue them "from generation to generation," with the malignity of a fiend, for four or five hundred years? Why murder innocent children for an offense committed by their fathers many, many generations before they were born? Why kill all the oxen, and asses, and camels? Had they too offended? In 1 Samuel xv, 3, will be found the last scene enacted in this bloody drama, "Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they hav, and spare them not, but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass." This scene of carnage, where gasping children are pressed to the bosom of dying mothers, must yield great consolation to the Christian when he realizes that it was all done according to the will of God. No man can bend a knee to such a God and maintain his self-respect. Pray tell me, ye pious godlings, why these helpless children should be slain for an offense committed by their ancestors hundreds of years before they were born.

Is this your God of justice? Is this the way he manifests his "loving kindness?" "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

The Bible God is simply a creation of the imagination. He is represented with all the frailties and passions of weak, erring mortals. His plans frequently miscarry. He is compelled to go from place to place to see what is going on, as in the case of building the tower of Babel. He shows his bombast by boasting of his power and his greatness. Like a passionate man, he gets mad and "swears in his wrath." He shows his egotism by declaring that there is "none like him." He is vacillating and changeable, at one time commanding the utter destruction of innocent children, at another time blessing them. He created man and pronounced him good, and then repented of what he had done. He shows that he is low in his associations by choosing as boon companions lechers, robbers, and murderers. He is far below the moral standard of any civilized nations, as is shown by his giving over innocent virgins to the lustful embrace of a bloody and brutalized soldiery who had murdered their fathers and mothers. He is vulgar and obscene, using such language as would not be tolerated by those who lay claim to respectability. Such is the Bible God as portrayed in the pages of scripture. Let no one think that I say these things to injure the feelings of any. The character of men will depend, in a great measure, upon the character of the God they worship. Man, today, is far in advance of those who fashioned the Bible God; but he never can attain to his full stature so long as he adores a God that is a representativ of an ignorant and barbarous age. As gods grow smaller, men will grow greater. Ex. xix, 9: "And Moses told the word of the people unto the Lord."

What kind of a God is it that did not know what the people said until Moses told him? It is said that "every word which we utter is spoken in the ear of the Lord;" that he knows even our innermost thoughts; that not a sparrow falls without his knowledge. If these things are so, what use was there of Moses mumbling over to the Lord what the people said? Moses did not tell the Lord anything, any more than anybody else did.

It is impossible for imperfect man to make a perfect God, and here lies the trouble. He is constantly coming short. He did not know whether Abraham would offer up his son or not until he tried him. Was he everywhere present when he showed his "back parts" to Moses? According to the account, he did not know what was going on in Sodom until he went there to see?

There are numerous instances mentioned in the Bible in which he did not know what was transpiring, and of things which baffled his skill and transcended his power.

Ex. xxxi, 15: "Whosoever doeth any work on the Sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death." I called the attention of a minister to this text, not long ago, and he said it meant "unnecessary work." If the minister had a right to say that God did not know what he was talking about, I hav a right to say that he did not talk at all. Man was far more exacting and superstitious in regard to creed and dogma then than he is now, and God was made to sanction the cruelty of their observance.

We hav risen far above the rigid Puritanical rules and observauces, and some day we shall fiud out that the less we hav of gods, and creeds, and Christianity, the better it will be for the race.

But let us return to the text. God says, "any work;" man says, "unnecessary work." Man has grown. God has stood still. And just in proportion as man has faith in the sayings of the Bible will he stand still. We make progress only as we outgrow our gods. According to the text we must not milk a cow or feed a pig. All domestic animals must fast over Sabbath. We must not build a fire even to prepare a little nourishment for a sick child. If God ever gave such an inhuman command he is the one who ought to be "put to death."

Ex. xxxii, 10. "Now, therefore, let me alone, that my wrath may wax hot against them, and that I may consume them." 12. "Turn from thy fierce wrath and repent of this evil against thy people." 14. "And the Lord repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people." How is this for an unchangeable God? Can God repent without changing? If he "repented of the evil which he thought to do," who knows but he has repented of sending Infidels to hell? and who knows but he has repented of the hell scheme altogether? And how does the Christian know when he gets to heaven that his New Jerusalem and white throne and golden harp will not turn to ashes? Who can depend upon a God that repents and whiffles about like a weather-cock?

27. "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor; and there fell on that day about three thousand men." Is this a "thus saith the Lord," or a "thus saith" somebody else? If the latter, there should be a rule to enable us to distinguish between the two. If it is a genuin "thus saith the Lord," then he is better fitted to lead a tribe of scalping savages than he is for our praise and adoration.

Lev. xx, 10. "The adulterer and the adulteress shall surely be put to death." Some of the best men and greatest philanthropists believe that the death penalty should not be inflicted under any circumstances. Under strict construction, the Mormons and many others might be proven guilty of adultery. Would any sane man say they ought to be put to death? This shows that man progresses while gods are stationary. How about David, and Solomon, and Jacob, and the hand-maids, and the mandrakes? Very few men could be found to-day who would say that the crime of adultery should be punished by death. And yet there are thousands of men who believe that there should be a God in the Constitution, and that the Bible should be the foundation of all law. Away back in the dim past men made a fool of a God, and the same imaginary God keeps making fools of men.

Lev. xxv, 44. "Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids which thou shalt hav, shall be of the heathen round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids." 45. "Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they beget in your house, and they shall be your posessions." 46. "And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them as a possession; they shall be your bondmen forever." Human slavery is the crime of crimes, and the curse of curses, because every crime and every curse is bound up in it. It has aptly been denominated the "sum of all villainies." There never was a man born to be a slave, nor a man to be a master. Freedom is an inalienable right, and cannot be wrested from a man, all the gods to the contrary notwithstanding. Scarcely an enlightened man could be found who would attempt to sustain slavery as a right. Now, my pious Christian readers, God is either in favor of slavery to-day, or else he never inspired the forty-fourth, forty-fifth, and forty-sixth verses of the twenty-fifth chapter of Leviticus, for he cannot change. The Christian who cannot understand that the Bible God is just a shadow of the morality and brutality of the times in which he originated is too dull to reason and too blind to see.

If a fair comparison could be drawn between man as he is to-day, and man as he was when the above verses were written, I think it would account for the slave-holding, woman-killing, child-murdering, virgin-ravishing God of the Bible. No doubt many will shudder at these remarks, but if any will show that the picture which I hav drawn of the Bible God is not fully warranted by scripture, I will gladly retract anything which I hav set down amiss. I admit that it is a terrible picture, but the Bible God is a terrible God.

Num. xxiii, 19. "God is not a man that he should lie, neither the son of man that he should repent."

Christians, do you believe that God inspired that language? It is only rational that a man who believes in an infallible God should think he could not lie, and the man who believes in an immutable God is forced to believe that he could not repent.

Gen. vi, 6. Here it is expressly stated that "it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth." Doesn't it look as though this iuspiration business had got a little cross-banded? A man may believe that God cannot repent, or he may believe that God did repent, but believe both statemeuts he cannot.

Now I hold that it is perfectly fair to treat the Bible just as we would a witness on the stand. When he crosses himself, or states something highly improbable or utterly impossible, his evidence is entitled to no weight farther than it is corroborated by other testimony, or supported by circumstances. The Bible should be subjected to the same rule. If not, why not?

Num. xxxi, 7. "And they warred against the Midianites." 17. "Now, therefore, kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him." 18: "But all the women children that hav not known man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselvs."

I hav said that the Bible God was a slave-holding, woman-killing, virgin-ravishing God. Don't think I would set down aught in malice. I would treat God fairly, but the Christians must not expect me to wash off God's war paint, and "giv his mauners a brush," in order to render him presentable. It is the Christian's Bible, and the Christian's God. I consider myself far above such a brutal, savage God, and as for the Bible, much of it is too foul for clean feet to tread upon. I want no stock in either.

25. "And thirty and two thousand persons in all, of women that hav not known man by lying with him." These, of course, according to verse eighteen, were given over to the soldiery. How is that, my Christian friend, for a decent God? Is it any wonder that he was ashamed to show his face to Moses?

Lady Sabbath-school teachers, stick a pin dowu here, and think of this transaction when you tell your classes that the Bible is the word of God.

It appears from the statement that after the Midianites had been slain, and the smoke of the battle cleared away, there was a division of the spoils, and it appears (39) that a part was set apart for the Lord, and he received as his share three score and one asses. It has long been a question what the Lord did with all these asses. But with those who hav witnessed the pranks of the Salvation Army, it is no longer a mystery. JOHN PECK.

THE PROTEST OF A DISTURBED CITIZEN.

By heat oppressed, and disinclined to roam,
I spend the Sabbath in my humble home.
Borne to my windows, looking toward the West,
Come anthems rising to the winged and blest,
And organ's peal that quivers on the air,
The drone of human voices blending there;
The shriek of tenor, orotund of bass,
Soprano screaming in Jehovah's face,
And wail of preacher supplicating grace.
A church looms skyward, mocking Babel's hight;
Through windows stained pours in the varied light;
An uncouth tower, offensiv to the eye,
Givs shelter to a bell whose agony
Finds voice in rasping and sepulchral sound,
That grates the nerves of all the dwellers round.

O pile of brick and monumental stone,
Thou'rt reared by martyrs, from their blood and bone:
For every brick a sacred life they gave,
And for each stone some hero found a grave.
Thy window panes that tint the sunlight's flood
Hav caught their hue from sacrificial blood;
And chime, and chant, and mammoth organ's tone,
Seem echoes of a dying martyr's groan.
Nuisance thou art to deity or man,
Thou church of God Almighty and Saint Ann.

A Last Word with "F. M. F. C."

I beg a small space of THE TRUTH SEEKER to say that I did not misunderstand our friend when substituting the action for the individual in using the word "labor." I still contend that at no time, nor under any circumstances whatever, is the laborer or the action capital in business. On the surface, perhaps, it looks quite clear that the slaves of the South were capital in business, but underneath it appears very different. Now what they were, and all human beings are, whether in a state of serfdom or freedom, is one of the natural resources of the earth, capable of storing labor or capital. Hence being capital producing machines, they were as much if not more sought for than a fruit-bearing tree, both having power to produce independent of the possessor. Still at no time would the slaves or the tree be capital (stored labor) in business. Only their products could be.

(Perhaps it will be said I did not understand the application of the word capital. To me there is but one definition, stored labor Even the natural resources of the earth are not capital in business till stored.)

What the land is to the landlord, was the slave to his master; both landlord and master succeeded in getting possession of that which in nature was never intended to be monopolized; and to-day everybody cries shame slavery; why not shame landlordism? The two are analogous. If a crime to monopolize one of the earth's natural resources in slavery, should it not be as great a crime to monopolize the earth itself?

The last I merely add in response to our friend's iutimation that I may possibly be one of those crazy Socialists. RAY D. CHAPMAN.

Miscellaneous.

The California Constitution.

Some time ago we found an article in a Liberal journal to the effect that under California's new constitution the churches were taxed, and the legislature without a chaplain. By courtesy of John Gibson, of Santa Maria, we hav been furnished with a copy of the document working these beneficent changes, and transfer such portions of it as are of especial interest to Freethinkers. The preamble is Deistical in nature, recognizing "Almighty God" as follows:

"We, the people of the state of California, grateful to Almighty God for our freedom, in order to secure and perpetuate its blessings, do establish this constitution."

Section 4 of the Declaration of Rights lays down the broad law that

"The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be guaranteed in this state; and no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness or juror on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this state."

The liberty of the press is stoutly maintained in these words:

"Every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right; and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press. In all criminal prosecutions for libels, the truth may be given in evidence to the jury; and if it shall appear to the jury that the matter charged as libelous is true, and was published with good motivs and for justifiable ends, the party shall be acquitted, and the jury shall hav the right to determin the law and the fact."

Under section 22 no appropriation can be made for the benefit of any asylum, hospital, or charitable or other institution whatsoever, not under the exclusiv management or control of the state, except institutions for the support and maintenance of minor orphans, or half orphans, or abandoned children, or aged persons in indigent circumstances; and, in all such cases, without any reference whatsoever to the wealth or poverty of such institutions, the aid must be granted by a uniform rule, and it cannot grant any such aid to one or more impoverished and meritorious institutions without granting the same aid in proportion to the number of inmates to all other institutions of the same name within the state, regardless of the necessities or merits of the case; and, in like manner, must grant to counties, cities and counties, cities and towns, the same pro-rata where such municipalities provide for the support of like persons. This is just, and could only be improved by compelling each town or county to provide support for their own paupers and not farm them out to institutions which are as often prisons as otherwise. The section reads:

"No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and upon warrants duly drawn thereon by the controler; and no money shall ever be appropriated or drawn from the state treasury for the use or benefit of any corporation, association, asylum, hospital, or any other institution not under the exclusiv management and control of the state as a state institution; nor shall any grant or donation of property ever be made thereto by the state; provided, that notwithstanding anything contained in this or any other section of this constitution, the legislature shall hav the power to grant aid to institutions conducted for the support and maintenance of minor orphans, or half orphans, or abandoned children, or aged persons in indigent circumstances; such aid to be granted by a uniform rule, and proportioned to the number of inmates of such respectiv inmates of such respectiv institutions; provided further, that the state shall hav, at any time, the right to inquire into the management of such institutions; provided further, that whenever any county, or city and county, or city, or town shall provide for the support of minor orphans, or half orphans, or abandoned children, or aged persons in indigent circumstances, such county, city and county, city, or town shall be entitled to receive the same pro rata appropriations as may be granted to such institutions under church or other control. An accurate statement of the receipts and expenditures of public moneys shall be attached to and published with the laws at every regular session of the legislature."

The constitution in section 25 enumerates thirty-three things which the legislature shall not do, and the twentieth is "exempting property from taxation." Article XIII. directs that all property shall bear its share of burden, in these words:

"All property in the state, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as decided by law. The word 'property,' as used in this article and section, is hereby declared to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal, and mixed, capable of private ownership; provided, that growing crops, property used exclusivly for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, this state, or to any county or municipal corporation within this state, shall be exempt from taxation."

If the legislature had allowed a chaplain to say prayers at the opening of its sessions, it is difficult to see how he could hav been paid—and who ever heard of a minister who didn't want pay for a political job?—for section 29, of article IV., says:

"The general appropriation bill shall contain no item or items of appropriation such as are required to pay the salaries of the state officers, the expenses of the government, and of the institutions under the exclusiv control and management of the state."

If section 30, of same article, had been incorporated in the New York constitution, a good many millions of dollars would hav been saved the taxpayers. It ought to be the organic law of every state:

"Neither the legislature, nor any county, city and county, township, school district, or other municipal corporation, shall ever make an approriation, or pay from any public fund whatever, or grant anything to or in aid of any religious sect, church, creed, or sectarian purpose, or help to support or sustain any school, college, university, hospital, or other institution controled by any religious creed, church, or sectarian denomination whatever; nor shall any grant or donation of personal property or real estate ever be made by the state, or any city, city and county, town, or other municipal corporation for any religious creed, church, or sectarian purpose whatever; provided, that nothing in this section shall prevent the legislature granting aid pursuant to section twenty-two of this article."

Article IX. prescribes the methods of conducting the common schools, section 8 of which prohibits giving money to religious schools in these words:

"No public money shall ever be appropriated for the support of any sectarian or denominational school, or any school not under the exclusiv control of the officers of the public schools; nor shall any sectarian or denominational doctrin be taught, or instruction thereon be permitted, directly or indirectly, in any of the common schools of this state."

It is also commanded that the University of California "shall be entirely independent of all political or sectarian influence, and kept free therefrom in the appointment of its regents."

Section 3 of article XX. provides for affirmation in place of the oath, and no reference to "God" is made. All the official is required to do is to support the constitutions of the United States and California and perform the duties of his office. "And no other oath, declaration, or test, shall be required as a qualification for any office of public trust."

Marriage is made a purely civil contract by this section of the same article:

"No contract of marriage, if otherwise duly made, shall be invalidated for want of conformity to the requirements of any religious sect."

Woman's rights are recognized to the extent that "no person shall, on account of sex, be disqualified from entering upon or pursuing any lawful business, vocation, or profession." The right of suffrage is, however, withheld. Eight hours is made a legal day's work on all government jobs.

Blaine of Maine.

Some friend sends a copy of the Chicago Herald, with the following marked:

"The Rev. Dr. James H. Esop, of the Second Presbyterian church in Albany, N. Y., makes the following estimate of James G. Blaine, which ought to discount ten times over what is said by Henry Ward Beecher and other clergymen who do not know him personally:

"I hav known Mr. Blaine since 1872. During ten years of that time I was pastor of the church in Augusta of which Mr. and Mrs. Blaine are members. The satisfaction I take in his nomination is based upon such knowledge of him as only a pastor can gain. I believe that I am too true a Republican, and I know that my conception of citizenship is too high, to permit me to ratify the exaltation of any man whose character has not the true ring. I hav been very near to Mr. Blaine, not only in the most trying political crises, but in the sharper trial of great grief in the household, and hav never yet detected a false note. I would not be understood as avowing too much for human nature. I mean that as I hav known him he has stood loyally by his convictions, that his word has always had back of it a clear purpose, and that purpose has always been worthy of the highest manhood. In his house he was always the soul of geniality and good heart. It was always summer in that house whatever the Maine winter might be without. And not only his rich neighbors and kinsmen welcomed him home, but a long line of the poor hailed the return of that family as a special providence. In the church he is honored and beloved. The good old New England custom of church-going with all the guests is enforced strictly in the Blaine household. Whoever is under his roof, from the president down, is expected to be with the family at church. Fair weather or foul, those pews were always well filled. Not only his presence on Sabbath, but his influence, his wise counsels, his purse, are freely devoted to the interests of the noble Old South church of Augusta. The hold which Mr. Blaine has maintained upon the hearts of such great numbers of his countrymen is not sufficiently explained by brilliant gifts or magnetism; the secret lies in his generous, manly, Christian character."

It is needless to say this is no answer to our questions. Except that his adhesion to Freethought would swell our ranks, and the country would be safer in the hands of an Infidel, we don't care a continental what Mr. Blaine's religious opinions are. The vital point is, will he aid in secularizing the government?

The Commandments in Canada.

One of the professors connected with the Normal school of Ottawa, not having the fear of God before his eyes, has formulated the following rules for the pupils:

"I. Thou shalt hav any other girls but these girls.

"II. Thou shalt not make unto thyself any graven image of any of these girls, or carry away any likeness of any girl that is in the lecture room above, or that is in the lecture room beneath, or that is in the waiting room beside the lecture room; thou shalt not bow to them nor take walks with them, for I, the drawing master, am a jealous drawing master, and hav reserved that special right for myself.

"III. Thou shalt not smoke upon the street, for I, the principal, will not hold him guiltless that smoketh upon the street.

"IV. Remember the hour of three o'clock on Friday afternoon. Four and a half days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but in the afternoon of the fifth day, thou shalt do no manner of work, thou, nor thy masters nor assistant masters, for I, the principal, require your regular and prompt attendance in this lecture room, to disperse you to the several ministers of the gospel to attend to your spiritual welfare, which I fear is sadly neglected during the rest of the week.

"V. Honor thy masters, and giv unto them strict and unhesitating obedience, that thy certificate may be granted to teach in the fair Province of Ontario.

"VI. Thou shalt not be out after 9:30 oclock.

"VII. Thou shalt not enter in by the center door nor loiter in the passages.

"VIII. Thou shall not steal sly winks and looks from those on your right.

"IX. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy boarding house keeper if thou findest any foreign matter in the hash, for she will surely giv thee away to the principal.

"X. Thou shalt not covet the gold medal; thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's marks, nor his learning, nor his ability, nor anything that is thy neighbor's."

The publication of this parody leads the Montreal Gazette to observe that such "playing upon Bible phraseology is little less than blasphemous," and another Canadian editor voices his indignation thus:

"An extraordinary piece of blasphemy was a few days ago publicly read for the amusement of the teachers in training at the Ottawa Normal School, being a travesty on the Ten Commandments, in which the thunders of Sinai and the oft-recurring name of the Almighty are frivolously played with to make the foolish young men and women laugh. Woe to the land whose children are placed under the watch and care of such triflers. To say nothing of reverence for Almighty God, the disrespect publicly displayed toward their teachers by those who participated in this piece of profanity bodes ill for the training of the rising generation in that most important of all the departments of school training—respect for authority."

The Freethinkers' Annual Convention.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I am receiving from Freethought friends in various sections inquiries where Cassadaga Lake is, the place where the annual Freethinkers' Convention is to be held on the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th days of September, and the best way to get there. Will you allow me to answer these inquiries through The Truth Seeker? The place is located on the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad, some ten miles west of Dunkirk and some fifteen miles east of Jamestown. The following description of the place I take from a circular before me:

"LOCATION AND ATTRACTIONS.

"The Cassadaga Lake Camp-meeting Grounds are eight miles from Lake Erie, and seven hundred feet above it; situated midway between New York and Chicago, one and a half hours by rail from Buffalo, five from Cleveland, nine from Pittsburgh, fourteen hours from Cincinnati, sixteen from Philadelphia, eighteen hours from New York, twenty hours from Boston and Washington, and twenty-one from Chicago. It lies on the shore of a beautiful chain of lakes, three in number, and at an elevation of nearly fourteen hundred feet above the level of the sea. Here can be found the perfection of water scenery with the purity of mountain air. From its great altitude, and the purity of the water and air, malaria, contagious and epidemic diseases are almost entirely unknown. The grounds are high, and descend by natural terraces to the water, and the sanitary condition and safety of the camp is carefully guarded and protected."

And the following I also cut from this circular, which will giv desired information:

"ROUTE OF TRAVEL.

"Eastern and western passengers over the Nickel Plate, Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroad, and eastern passengers over the New York, Lake Erie & Western (formerly Erie railroad), change cars at Dunkirk, N. Y., and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh to

"CASSADAGA CAMP-MEETING GROUNDS.

"Eastern and western passengers over the New York, Pennsylvania & Ohio railroad (formerly Atlantic and Great Western), and eastern passengers over the Buffalo & Jamestown railroad, change cars at Atlantic and Great Western Crossing, and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad for Lily Dale Station."

To be more definit, I will say that persons coming to the Convention from most of the cities or large towns in the United States will find it the cheaper to purchase excursion tickets to Chautauqua Lake. These can be obtained very cheap, and then leave the cars at the crossing of the Dunkirk, Alleghany Valley & Pittsburgh railroad near Jamestown, and then take the last mentioned road to Lily Dale Station, near the camping-grounds. But persons coming from any station on the N. Y., L. E., or W. railroad, or any of its branches west of Binghamton, will pay full fare to Dunkirk and then be returned at one-third fare home. The Dunkirk, Alleghany Valley & Pittsburgh railroad will sell excursion tickets at two cents per mile from any station on that road.

THE HOTEL RATES.

The following prices hav been established at the hotel for board: $1.50 per day, for one day and less than three days; and over, $1.00 per day. Table board: breakfast, 40 cents; dinner, 50 cents; supper, 30 cents. Lodgings, 25 to 50 cents.

H. L. Green, Secretary.

P. S.—Our association has never met in as pleasant a place before, and never before had arrangements for as cheap railroad and hotel rates, and I predict it will be much the largest Freethought convention ever held. Most of the Freethought lecturers of this country will be present, and two or three from foreign countries. H. L. G.

Faith in Revelation Not Requisit.

The Rev. Dr. Curry, of Chicago, has been elected editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, an official church organ. Mr. G. D. Fox, who dates his letter from the United States Senate, writes to the Sun that if that paper's recent statement of Dr. Curry's opinion of the Bible be correct, this election by the General Conference "only needs to be known to blow the church to pieces." In answer the Sun remarks:

"Last winter the Rev. Dr. Curry made an address before the Methodist preachers of Chicago. What he said, apparently, was not intended for publication, but was rather a confession of skepticism for the ears of his clerical brethren only. It so happened, however, that one of the preachers present was a stenographer also, and he took down Dr. Curry's remarks exactly as they came from his lips. Subsequently the verbatim report, as to the accuracy of which the preacher is ready to take his oath, was printed, and our remarks concerning Dr. Curry were based on that report.

"Here is a part of what Dr. Curry then said:

"'But we are now standing on the eve of the most stupendous revolution in reference to the doctrins of the Bible that the church has ever known. Uncertainty and doubt are pressing upon us. We are not certain of the authorship of the Old Testament. We cannot tell what part was written by Moses, and what part by other hands of the books attributed to Moses. We say David wrote the Psalms, but we know that the Psalms were not all written by David. They were written by different persons at long intervals. No one can tell who wrote the book of Job. It contains evidences of being one of the oldest books in the Bible. The Old Testament abounds with 10,000 old wives' fables, which will finally drop out, like a tadpole loses its tail when it has no further use for it. It would not be prudent now for us to attack these fables in the pulpit. But I must say there is a great deal in the Old Testament that is of very little value to religion. It is not all given by inspiration. When you hav to giv up what your mother taught you, do it honestly, but do not say much about it publicly. The revised New Testament is incomparably superior to the old version; but there are still many things that will hav to be changed. But I am awfully shy of the Old Testament. It has got to be thoroughly revised, and, if criticism says that any of the books are not genuin, they must go overboard. Many of the prophecies of Isaiah and other prophets, that are applied to Christ and the church, had reference to the return of the Jews from their captivity. Let those who attack Robinson (Robertson) Smith, and others with him, move slowly, for they may find themselvs standing on the same ground in the near future.'

"If that does not mean that the Rev. Dr. Curry has outgrown his old faith in the scriptures as all given by inspiration, if it is not the language of a skeptic, it has no meaning. It certainly justifies the remark which our correspondent quotes from the Sun. Of course, if the Methodist church wants Dr. Curry as the editor of its organ, that is its own business; but it is evident that the Methodists no longer require that their teachers shall hav faith in revelation."

Let Mr. Fox stand clear of the falling pieces of Methodism.

Mr. Bradlaugh Aids a Nihilist.

Alexander Seminoff, a highly educated Russian, who has been living in Cincinnati a short time, and attracted the attention of scholars, givs the following account of himself: "My name is Alexander Seminoff. In 1876 I was one of the editors of a secret Nihilist paper, and, having been convicted of treason, I was sent to Siberia for an unlimited number of years. Nihilism, you may be aware, is spread all over the Russian empire, and the peculiar secrecy of its principles and workings is mainly owing to the fact that only ten may join together to form a band. Each band often knows nothing whatever about another band of ten. Each band works separately. We do not know even outside of our band who is a Nihilist or who is not. After editing a nihilistic paper for two years, I was betrayed to the police by one of my associates, and was surprised one night in bed and taken to the prison in Odessa, after having been cruelly scourged. After an eight months' examination, I was sentenced to three years' hard labor in Siberia, and to exile as a colonist in the extreme north of the country. In June, 1876, I was separated according to legal form sanctioned by the clergy of Russia, from my wife and children, and with head shaved on one side, and twenty-eight pounds of iron attached to me, I was sent with other alleged criminals to the central prison in Moscow. The journey lasted fourteen months, and during that time the knout was used freely on the prisoners. Our destination was Nertschinsk, and on arriving we were assigned to different gold mines. In the mines I worked from 4 o'clock in the morning until 9 at night. The allowance of food per day is two and a half pounds of black bread half baked and hardly palatable, and a bowl of soup with a small quantity of meat. Morning and evening a cup of tea is allowed. I endured my suffering for two and a half years. Then I completely broke down, and the doctor of the district declared that I was unfit for work. The rest of my sentence was remitted, and I was immediately assigned to my place in the colony. It was in one of the primitiv forests of the north where wolves, bears, and reindeer dwell. In 1881, toward the end of May, I resolved, with four companions, to escape without money or weapons, and with only a knife and tea-kettle. We took the direction toward the Caspian Sea, through forests and an almost impassable country. We had no shoes on our feet, and kept ourselvs alive on fish, game, and mushrooms. In the Tauskian country we separated, and with only one companion, Marsilli Murainnoff, I went on. I soon lost him, and then pursued my journey alone. At length I arrived at Astrabad and Teheran, in Persia, where I received assistance. My hair had grown over my shoulders, my beard extended to my chest, I had neither shirt nor shoes, and my face was sunburnt almost to a black color. An English telegraph operator took charge of me. He had me washed and gave me clean clothing. I next went through Turkey and thence to Switzerland, where I was arrested and kept in prison for four months. Again I was arrested in Hesse Darmstadt, and served a term of five months. I then resolved to find peace in England or the United States. I met Mr. Bradlaugh in London, and at his request remained at his house for four days. Through his kindness, I received means enough to take me to the United States. I arrived in New York in January last, and hav been in Cincinnati a few days only. I want to go to Chicago, where I understand a great many Russians reside."

For Reorganization.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: You don't know how I long to see the Liberals of this country united, heart and hand, in a national organization. Not only can nothing be accomplished in our present disorganized state, but our failure to fraternize is cited everywhere by our enemies as evidence of our tendency to riot, wrong, chaos, and the devil generally. They may well say that it is a bad cause which cannot organize and harmonize its adherents.

However much we may differ in relation to a thousand and one details, there is one point upon which all Liberals will agree—the secularization of our government. Methods to this end which fail to receive the almost unanimous approval of Liberals cooperating, should be laid aside. Carefully and gradually the field of agreement and operation could be enlarged until all the work was laid off that one organization could successfully carry on.

Nothing need prevent the working of a dozen special class societies aiming at specific and secondary objects. Very likely I should myself desire to take stock in a few of them. I believe in a division and subdivision of labor. The less variety, the greater proficiency. One organization cannot do it all and do it well. Our Christian neighbors hav one national organization called the "Evangelical Alliance," and others of various names and purposes, through all which they wage war against us Liberals. They are combined to tie us hand and foot; let us combine to prevent them from doing it.

If reorganization and a bran new name is necessary to secure union and harmony, let it be that. The word League isn't no great shakes for a name, anyway. If it is a "stumbling-block" to any number of our brethren, let it go. A new banner flung to the breeze with "Universal Mental Liberty" on one side, and "National Liberal Union," or "American Secular Union," or any other name, inscribed upon the other, will serve as well, or better, to fight under, than our old ones, grimed, as they are, with fratricidal gore. No difference now who was right or who was wrong. Our enemies are after us. Let us "pool our issues," and roll up our sleeves and go to work. S. R. Shepherd.

The Noblest Example of the Age.

Reading of charity, I hav ever thought that a monument sky-reaching should be erected to the memory of that poor Englishman, Wright, of whom Harper's made mention some years ago. And the story ought to be retold for a lesson and example. He was a poor, hard-working man. Visiting one day a penitentiary, his soul grew sad at seeing so many unfortunates. "What becomes of them?" he asked of the keeper. "Oh, they almost every soul are sure to get back here or into another prison."

"And is there no help for it?"

"No! Who will employ them? They are forced to crime after once getting here."

A grand thought struck his mind. "Can I get acquainted with one about to leave here and visit him every week? I hav an idea I can save one anyhow." Permission was given. He formed the acquaintance of one and told him his object. He arranged to get him employment in the very shop he himself worked in. When the prisoner's time expired, he took him with him to his house. He exacted of him a pledge that he would help him to redeem two more. In time they had four workers. Each one coming out of prison engaged to aid. By Wright's exertions, he got one or two influential persons to countenance the work. Ere many years, over one hundred redeemed men were thus at work, and the keepers of the prisons declared that in several years not one prisoner thus taken care of and given work on discharge ever had got back. Every man was noted for steady industry, and for taking the same interest in others that Wright had done.

Here is one of the noblest efforts towards forming a true brotherhood I ever heard of, and I hope to call attention to it. The state does everything to ruin and pervert these unfortunate men and women. Let individuals join to save them. C. I.

Modern vs. Ancient.

"There is nothing new under the sun" was a very unwise remark of a reputedly wise old king. Yet how often has it been repeated, apparently in the sincerity of belief, by cavilers at the host of innovations that hav ever since been coming in conflict with ancient doctrins and beliefs respecting every branch of human thought and action! When Solomon reigned, the man who could read or write was so rare an exception as to be an object of curiosity and mystery. Schoolhouses and education for the masses were unknown, nor did the common people possess a right to property, liberty, or even life itself, that he, as their king, was bound to respect. They were as completely subject to the will and caprice of the king as were his sheep and oxen. No law or power stood between them and his will and purposes. The lives and welfare of an entire people were as nothing when weighed in the balance against the pleasure and purpose of a king.

Solomon, with all his wisdom and glory, never saw a printed book or a newspaper. He never heard of a post-office, sent a telegram, or talked through a telephone. He never rode on a rail-car, steamship, or any other conveyance equal in comfort and convenience to a modern lumber-wagon. He never saw an iron plow, a power-loom, or mariner's compass; while the Mrs. Solomons never saw a range with hot and cold water—to say nothing of a sewing-machine, a patent washer, or clothes-wringer.

A single regiment of men, armed with modern implements of war, would put to almost instant flight the most numerous army King Solomon ever saw, if armed as were the warriors of his time. No subject of his kingdom ever enjoyed the privilege of a trial by jury, and not even his wisest men ever presumed that the earth was other than a vast flat surface, around which the sun, moon and stars revolved every twenty-four hours, and that they were, as they appear, mere tiny objects, existing simply as attendants, and for the convenience of the earth. Solomon veritably believed in the ends of the earth, and that rain was poured from the windows of heaven. Thunder was to him the voice of a disturbed deity. Comets and meteors were heavenly messengers presaging war, famin, pestilence, or other dire calamities, which were deemed to be the judgments of an offended deity.—Penman's Art Journal.

Stray Scraps.

Said the new Bishop Mallalieu at the People's church, Boston, Mass., Sunday, June 2d: "There are some weak Christians that tremble when they see the investigations of science, when they seem to find that this world is millions of years old." And well they may; but the bishop seemed to find consolation in infallible (?) Paul's assurance: "We know that if this earthy house be dissolved, we hav a house of God not made with hands," etc.

Mr. Gamaliel Bradford described some of the effects of stock gambling upon legitimate business in an address before the Young Men's Christian Association last evening.—Boston Journal, June 6th. Glad to hear it! Just the place where stock gambling should be described, as most of the stock gamblers and defaulters are graduates from the Young Men's Christian Association, alias the church.

The Baccalaureate sermon delivered by James Latimer, D.D., Dean of the University School of Theology, Boston, is a marvel of inconsistency. After having exalted theology to the hights and accuracy of science, he eases his troubled conscience by declaring, "In fact, science and theology rest on probabilities, both stand on the same footing as regards absolute truth." What a whopper!

Our Massachusetts legislature, following suit of the National Salary Grab, voted to pay themselvs $150 extra for their persistent absenteeism in prolonging the session to one hundred and fifty-five days. The law against non-recovery of damages for "personal injury on the Lord's day" was repealed. Woman Suffrage received the worst defeat it ever sustained, and "Constitutional prohibition" was negatived. The Republican national ticket does not suit the Massachusetts Reform Club (prohibitionists).

Who ever heard of a prayer being cheered? And yet it was actually done at the late Chicago Republican Convention, because so full of genuin Republicanism. And why not? The Hebrews used to shout in their camp and make a mighty noise unto Jehovah. We wish the reporter had told us whether God accepted the prayer offered, or whether he rejected it, as he did the fifty million petitions offered for the life of President Garfield. Said the prayer, the Rev. Mr. Bristol, "We thank thee, O God, for the Republican party!" Indeed! what had God to do about its formation, its successes, its corruptions, and its possible defeat and dissolution!

Said Congressmen Horr, of Michigan, at the Republican Convention: "God would not hav put the gold, and coal, and iron in the bowels of the land if he thought the Democratic party was going to rule the country and abolish the tariff." Where would he hav put them—in the sky? Mercy, what a tumble—not in prices, but on our heads!

A resolution of the Republican Convention, June 5th: "Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress to enact such laws as shall promptly and effectivly suppress the system of polygamy within our territory, and divorce the political from the ecclesiastical power of the so-called Mormon church, and that the law so enacted should be rigidly enforced by the civil authorities if possible, and by the military if need be. The people of the United States in their organized capacity constitute a nation, and not a mere confederacy of states." That's good. Divorce all political and ecclesiastical power as soon as you can, and begin on the Mormons, if you please, Mr. Republican Party, but, pray, don't resolve upon military coercion, lest you find too bloody work before you get through with all necessary divorces of state and church. Ella E. Gibson.

An Ebionite Calumny Concerning Paul.

Epiphanius, bishop of Constantia (formerly Salamis) in Cyprus from A.D. 367 until his death in 403, was born of Jewish parents in Palestine. His credulity and want of honesty were excessiv(Chambers's Enc.). He tells us a scandalous and incredible story about Paul. The Ebionites, he says, denied that Paul was a Jew, and asserted that he was born of a gentile father and mother, but having gone up to Jerusalem, he became a proselyte, and submitted to circumcision in the hope of marrying a daughter of the high priest; but not being able to obtain her, he was enraged, and wrote against circumcision, the Sabbath, and the law (Epiph. Haeres. xxx, 16. Sup. Rel. iii, 316).

This testimony is not only worthless, but is opposed to Paul's own repeated affirmation that he was an Israelite of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew descendant of the Hebrews, circumcised the eighth day, and as to the law a Pharisee without fault (Rom. xi, i; 2 Cor. xi, 22; Phil. iii, 5, 6).

Epiphanius only repeated an Ebionite calumny. There certainly was violent opposition to Paul and his doctrins until the latter part of the second century, when the Catholic church accepted his epistles as authority.

JOHN THE REVELATOR AND PAUL.

The prevailing opinion that the book of Revelation was written A.D. 95 or 96, at Patmos, accords with the tradition that John was banished to that island near the close of the reign of Domitian; but internal evidence points to an earlier date and to Ephesus as the place of writing. The book itself shows that Jerusalem had not been destroyed, but that the catastrophe was impending. Seven kings are spoken of; "five are fallen, one is and the other is not yet come" (xvii, 10). Galba was the sixth emperor; or if Julius Cæsar is called the first, then Nero was the sixth. Nero died June 11, A.D. 68; and Galba, his successor, reigned till January 69.

Early tradition ascribes the authorship of the book to the apostle John, but critical doubts began with Dionysius of Alexandria, who ascribes it either to John the presbyter, or to Cerinthus. To this opinion Eusebius was inclined.

John the Revelator does not claim to be an apostle. He calls himself "the servant of Jesus Christ," and by implication excludes himself from the college of apostles in the following passages:

"Rejoice over her, thou heaven, and ye holy apostles [hoi agioi kai hoi apostoloi] and prophets (xviii, 20).

"And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb" (xxi, 14).

Even against such evidence as this Dr. Davidson argues in favor of the apostle John as the author; and his argument would be quite cogent if not only John, but several other of the apostles, were living at the time the book was written, which the learned doctor never dreamed of doubting. For it is inconceivable that in the lifetime of the apostles a book falsely purporting to emanate from one of them could hav been accepted as genuin. It surely would hav been disavowed by John himself and contradicted by the other apostles.

But the case is quite different when we consider that there were two Johns living a hundred years apart. Eusebius quotes a passage from Papias distinguishing the two, and says:

"So that it is here proved that the statement of those is true who assert that there were two of the same name in Asia, that there were also two tombs in Ephesus, and that both are called Jonn's even to this day" (iii, 39).

We deem it, therefore, possible that the Apocalyps was written by the presbyter John; though Dionysius of Alexandria, who died A.D. 265, says that prior to his time some had set it aside as a forgery by Cerinthus (Eus. vii, 25).

There seems to be no evidence in favor of an earlier date for the composition of this book than A.D. 68. It may therefore be regarded as a description of the state of the church in Asia at that time by an orthodox pen. Paul, it will be remembered, caused a division in the synagog at Ephesus. That division doubtless continued long after Paul's death, even down through she first and second centuries. But the author of the Apocalyps was bitterly opposed to the heretics. In his address to the church of Ephesus he says:

"Thou hast tried them which say they are apostles and are not, and hast found them liars" (ii, 2).

And to the church of Smyrna:

"I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews and are not, but are the synagog of Satan" (ii, 9).

And to the church of Philadelphia:

"I will make them of the synagog of Satan which say they are Jews and are not, but do lie" (iii, 9).

And to the church of Pergamos:

"Thou hast there them that hold the doctrin of Balaam, who taught to Balac to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication" (ii, 14).

And to the church of Thyatira:

"Thou sufferest that woman Jezebel, which callest herself a prophetess, to teach and to seduce my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed to idols" (ii, 20).

These denunciations seem to be aimed at the followers of Paul and of his associates, whose doctrins the author caricatures. The revelator avoids naming the false apostles, but in the same connection twice mentions the Nicolaitans whose deeds and doctrins he hates (ii, 6, 15). He commends the Ephesians for hating them, and reproves the church of Pergamos for tolerating them. Were those deeds and doctrins essentially different from those specifically denounced? It appears not, according to the revised translation:

"So hast thou also some that hold the teaching of the Nicolaitans in like manner" (ii, 15).

Nicolas the proselyte was one of the seven deacons of Antioch. Irenæus claims him as the founder of the sect of Nicolaitans. Epiphanius describes him as the originator of this and other immoral sects. Clement, of Alexandria, on the other hand, defends him against the charge of immorality, and says that his doctrins were misinterpreted by his followers.

Nicolas was a proselyte, and Paul was the apostle to the gentiles, while John the Revelator was evidently a Hebrew with narrow Judaic views. He condescends to mention the gentiles but once, and then in this contemptuous manner:

"But the court which is without the temple leave out, and measure it not; for it is given unto the gentiles, and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months" (xi, 2).

We conclude therefore that the Revelator meant to denounce the followers of the apostle to the gentiles. One doctrin he held in common with them, namely, the near advent of the messiah. But that was the prevailing doctrin of the time, beginning with the book of Daniel, about 168 B.C., and continuing until the end of the second century. But there is this peculiarity of the Apocalyps, that its author does not seem to recognize a messiah as having already come in the flesh; the "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" is yet to appear on earth.

A Modern Elias.

Among the queer fish to be met with in New York is Bishop S. S. Snow. He preaches sermons on prophecy every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock at the corner of Twenty-third street and Fourth avenue, in the hall of the medical college. This is the hall where one branch of the Liberal Club held its meetings for a while after the Rev. Charles McCarthy had succeeded in producing a split in that organization several years ago. A representativ of THE TRUTH SEEKER attended upon the ministrations of Bishop Snow one Sunday recently. Twenty-two persons were present, including Mr. Snow and the reporter. A half dozen men and women were gathered around a melodeon placed in one of the aisles about half way between the entrance and the circular bar upon which the pulpit is mounted, and these were singing with such ability as they possessed a hymn which ran thus:

Hark! in the wilderness a cry—
The herald's voice that loudly calls,
"Prepare the way, the Lord is nigh,
And every voice before him falls."

Or words to that effect. The singers were not especially talented. An old man with a rasping voice was looked upon with marked disfavor by the rest of the choir, but was not in the least disconcerted thereby.

Bishop Snow opened the exercises by observing that it was not inappropriate to occasionally turn our thoughts backward as well as inward. To carry out this idea, he read an extract from a letter which he wrote to the Boston Investigator under date of December 27, 1844, explaining that the Investigator was an Infidel paper, to which he had been previous to that time a subscriber, contributor, and also among its agents. "I was then an Infidel myself," said he, "God forgiv me! and my unbelief in the Bible was of the most determined kind." Under the light of Second Adventism, however, Mr. Snow was led to see the deplorable error of his way. His peculiar delusion at present is that he is the Elias and other singular persons foretold in prophecy. Mr. Snow extracted his text from the anecdote of the ten virgins, who were engaged, it seems, to carry transparencies in a procession. Five of these were so improvident as to go without oil. The painful manner in which they eventually found themselvs left is related in full. He then entered into an argument with himself to demonstrate the moral of this melancholy circumstance, directing his remarks chiefly to a sedate individual seated near the pulpit, evidently the most responsiv person present. When Bishop Snow conceived that he had clinched a point, he appealed to the sedate individual and inquired in a terrific voice: "Isn't that so? Can you dispute that?" The victim nodded and shook his head in a dazed way. The questioner crowed gleefully over the sedate individual's humiliation and his own triumph, and wriggled about in a most contemptuous and exasperating manner. Beyond question, the bridegroom, he argued, was Jesus Christ; and by subtracting 457 years from 2300 days, it was proved that he came for the second time in 1844. It was hoped that the insignificant fact that no one had seen the bridegroom would not cause any intelligent person to doubt his having come at the appointed time. He was merely "tarrying," as he had done in the parable of the ten virgins. We must not walk by sight, but by faith.

The sedate individual being now apparently under sound conviction as to the foregoing facts, he was tested on the identity of the ten virgins, half of whom were confessedly foolish. Were they the Protestant and Catholic churches? The responsiv person, in the extremity of doubt, nodded and shook his head again alternately. No; they were not the Protestant and Catholic churches. Those institutions were respectivly the mother of harlots and the abominations of the earth. Therefore the ten uncultivated damsels were the Second Adventists. Here the sedate individual momentarily collapsed. "Now," said the merciless tormentor, "whose voice was it that awoke the sleepers when the bridegroom appeared? Who was the faithful sentinel? I know and you know. You hear him now." The face of the sedate individual gleamed with sudden joy, and he winked knowingly at Mr. Snow.

In about this manner Bishop Snow's meetings are carried on. His central object is to show that he is the second John Baptist crying in the wilderness. Whatever may be his course of reasoning, it is sure to lead to that conclusion. He talks familiarly with his audience. A lady dropped asleep during his discourse. He called attention to the circumstance, and paused while her escort proceeded with sundry shakes and prods to restore her to wakefulness. The preacher espied the writer and asked him if he knew the dimensions of the new Jerusalem that John the Revelator saw let down from heaven. The writer felicitated himself that he did. This question was followed up with the query if the reporter properly appreciated the difference between regeneration and conversion. No. "Well," said Mr. Snow, "there are some people who are ignorant beyond belief. Was Christ ever converted? and yet did he not call upon his disciples to follow him in regeneration?" And thus the discourse was carried on for a dreary, vacuous, and uninteresting hour. The bishop is ludicrously conceited, and intensely overbearing and insulting toward his hearers, who, evidently attracted by his sensational advertisments, go to hear him through curiosity. He is a harmless fanatic, though as much out of place in an enlightened age as is the Salvation Army. A product of the Bible, he may perhaps prove useful in a measure by deterring others from sacrificing their reason as he has sacrificed his upon the altar of Daniel the Delirious and John the Revelator. He is a melancholy example of a good man gone wrong.

Faith or Trust in the Gods.

It has often appeared very strange why faith should be the leading and essential feature of all the religions of the world. Hav we not found a solution of the mystery in this, that faith or confidence is the basis of the villain's success? Nothing startles him so much as even suspicion, and investigation is death to all his vile schemes.

If it is strong evidence of rascality or tyranny in any man to insist on faith or confidence in himself as the only conditions of a business or other transaction of vital importance that he has forced upon another person, would not the demanding of such conditions be equally suspicious and unjust in any one, though claiming to be a God? Inasmuch as positiv knowledge can only be had by positiv proof, all shades of belief or faith are evidences that the thing believed in is unknown. It is conjecture only. Therefore, to ask consent of the judgment without proof is unreasonable, and to try to force it is tyranny. So it would seem to the unregenerated. Brethren, let us pray for that sharp, discriminating sense that would enable us to see that things done by holy persons and in holy places are quite different from those done by sinners in the external world. G. W. BIDDLE.

"The Bible Analyzed."

This work, by John R. Kelso, is to the Bible what Lord Ross's telescope was when applied to the starry heavens, a resolver of the composition and mystery of these creations. The law of evolution is as clearly traced in religions and their sacred books as is seen in the development of worlds and the various orders of life upon them. He shows conclusivly that the Old Testament was not written until after the Babylonish captivity, more than five hundred years after the death of Moses, and proves that the latter could not hav written the Pentateuch. This any unprejudiced mind will be ready to concede on perusal of the arguments set forth in the book.

During the Jewish captivity of seventy years among the Chaldeans, the Jews took on many of the manners and customs of the land to which they had been removed, and no less was the change wrought in their religion and religious worship. They had learned that their religion needed a cosmogony, and explanation of how the world and man upon it came into existence, as well as a god idea inseparable from all worship. Evidently this was cunningly devised by Hilkiah, the priest, and the scribes he let into the secret, in finding a book of the law of the Lord on their return from captivity to Jerusalem, and in which the Chaldaic cosmogony, or Genesis, was first written, as it bears internal evidence of being produced at that date. "Of the finding of this book," he says, "there is something suspicious in the circumstance that the book should hav been found by a priest. This was according to the usual course of priestcraft. Strangely enough, all the sacred books of the world that hav ever been found hav been found by priests; and all that hav ever been received directly from heaven hav been received by priests. There is also something suspicious in the circumstance that in this case, as in all others of the kind, the book which was found should happen to contain the favorit doctrins of the very priest who found it. Without fear of successful contradiction, I assert that no priest ever did find or receive from heaven a book whose teachings were at variance with his own preconceived opinions. In all cases of this kind the book has always happened to confirm, never to change, the previous opinions of the very priest who happened to find or receive it. In all cases the parties happen to find just such books as they respectivly happen to want." Thus was the monotheism of the Jews incorporated with the various orders of deities of Chaldea, as their names of seraphim and cherubim indicate. The books of the Old Testament, as well as those of the New, are proved not to be written by the men whose names they bear, and that their dates and authenticity are unknown.

Christianity is shown to be but an outgrowth from Judaism, substituting Christ as a sacrifice sufficient, in lieu of the lambs and goats, which were getting rather too expensiv for the purpose. Then, again, the Emperor Constantine engrafted paganism into Christianity, with its idea of demi-gods or mediators, thence the long succession of popes and potentates of the Catholic and Protestant churches since that time.

These changes and evolutions are presented in so clear and forcible a manner that the mind is led irresistibly to the same conclusions of the author.

Mr. Kelso has done much in this work to clear the ground whereon the temple of liberty and humanity may be reared; wherein art, beauty, goodness, and moral worth shall receive the homage so long paid to imaginary deities.

In this analysis the author has gone through the wilderness of superstition, uprooting obstructions and blazing the way straight through to the clear fields of truth.

No one can read this book without feeling that the scales of sacredness hav fallen from his eyes in regard to the Bible and its God.

The book is beautifully printed in large, clear type on fine paper; contains over eight hundred octavo pages, and sells for $3.00. MRS. LUNA HUTCHINSON.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Can you not publish Bryant's "Thanatopsis" in THE TRUTH SEEKER? I think it is one of the most beautiful things that was ever written. It is exceedingly appropriate to read at the funeral of an Atheist, as it contains no theology or superstition, and I presume that a great many of your readers hav never seen it. FRANK S. MONTGOMERY.

THANATOPSIS.

To him who in the love of nature holds
Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language; for his gayer hours
She has a voice of gladness, and a smile
And eloquence of beauty, and she glides
Into his dark musings with a mild
And gentle sympathy, that steals away
Their sharpness ere he is aware. When thoughts
Of the last bitter hour come like a blight
Over thy spirit, and sad images
Of the stern agony, and shroud, and pall,
And breathless darkness, and the narrow house,
Make thee to shudder and grow sick at heart,
Go forth, unto the open sky, and list
To nature's teachings, while from all around—
Earth and her waters, and the depth of air—
Comes a still voice. Yet a few days, and thee
The all-beholding sun shall see no more
In all his course; nor yet in the cold ground,
Where thy pale form was laid, with many tears,
Nor in the embrace of ocean, shall exist
Thy image. Earth, that nourished thee, shall claim
Thy growth, to be resolved to earth again,
And, lost each human trace, surrendering up
Thine individual being, shalt thou go
To mix forever with the elements,
To be a brother to the insensible rock,
And to the sluggish clod, which the rude swain
Turns with his share and treads upon. The oak
Shall send his roots abroad, and pierce thy mold.
Yet not to thine eternal resting-place
Shalt thou retire alone, nor couldst thou wish
Couch more magnificent. Thou shalt lie down
With patriarchs of the infant world—with kings,
The powerful of the earth—the wise, the good,
Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past;
All in one mighty sepulcher. The hills,
Rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun—the vales
Stretching in pensiv quietness between;
The venerable woods; rivers that move
In majesty, and the complaining brooks
That make the meadows green; and, poured around all,
Old ocean's gray and melancholy waste—
Are but the solemn decorations all
Of the great tomb of man. The golden sun,
The planets, all the infinit host of heaven,
Are shining on the sad abodes of death
Through the still lapse of ages. All that tread
The globe are but a handful to the tribes
That slumber in its bosom. Take the wings
Of morning, traverse Barca's desert sands,
Or lose thyself in the continuous woods
Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound,
Save his own dashings—yet—the dead are there.
And millions in those solitudes, since first
The flight of years began, hav laid them down
In their last sleep—the dead reign there alone.
So shalt thou rest, and what if thou shalt fall
Unnoticed by the living, and no friend
Take note of thy departure. All that breathe
Will share thy destiny. The gay will laugh,
When thou art gone, the solemn brood of care
Plod on, and each one as before will chase
His favorit phantom; yet all these shall leave
Their mirth, and their employments, and shall come
And make their bed with thee. As the long train
Of ages glide away, the sons of men,
The youth in life's green spring, and he who goes
In the full strength of years, matron, and maid,
The bowed with age, the infant in the smiles
And beauty of its innocent age cut off—
Shall one by one be gathered to thy side,
By those who, in their turn, shall follow them.
So liv, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, that moves
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Know Thyself.

If there had never been another command given to the world, and that one had been obeyed, the world would to-day occupy a higher standard in progressiv life than it now does; and how few realize the importance of becoming acquainted with themselvs!

Man, know thyself, study the laws which govern thy physical structure, learn how to preserve the harmony of the system. The natural condition of the body is health, and by becoming acquainted with the laws governing us, and living in obedience to those laws, health must necessarily be the result.

And when we hav learned the laws governing our bodies we should endeavor to become acquainted with our minds. Learn to think. Too long has the world allowed the few to do the thinking for the many. Learn to think for yourselvs, and learn to think logically. Keep your eyes open, observe the events which are transpiring, and learn to trace from cause to effect.

Note the religious movements of the day. Observe the attitude of the various so-called Christian leaders toward each other. Study the history of the religious movements of the past. Go back and learn who originated them, and where. Follow them and their history, and decide for yourselvs whether they are the light of the world. Be no parrots, idly prating, but take up the live interests of the day. Learn their history. Learn the characters of the leaders of political movements; judge of the reasons actuating them.

Form your own opinions on all subjects which are in your power to investigate. These are some of the methods by which the masses may learn to think for themselvs. For the time has arrived when every man and woman who has the cause of human progress at heart should understand the true condition of affairs. On the one hand the church, endeavoring to so amend the Constitution that it will recognize the Bible God as the ruler of the people, the one to whom our homage is due, so that laws can be enacted compelling everyone to sustain the church. Oh, can you not see there is danger ahead? for it is not by fair and honorable legislation that they hope to accomplish this, but by pious intrigue they hope to pass the amendment at some favorable opportunity when the friends of human freedom are off duty.

On the other hand, the laxity which is manifest in a large percentage by those who claim to be Liberals. They hav thrown off the yoke of superstition, and no longer fear or accept the teachings of the church, but hav set themselvs down and cry, "Peace and safety. Why troublest thou us?" And while we recognize in this one of the laws of nature, a reaction from the restralnts in which they hav been held in the past, the necessities of the case require that they should be aroused, for the enemy is at our very doors, and the sentries are asleep at their posts. Could we realize the condition of affairs as it really is to-day we would start at the danger that threatens. The coil of the Jesuitical serpent will, if efforts are not made to prevent, entwine itself around the very life of this nation. See to it, ye who call yourselvs freemen, and ere it is too late avert the danger which threatens. See to it that the candidate who is elected to be a leader of this great people is a man who can be trusted, for there never was a time in the life of this nation when such watchfulness was necessary as at the present. There never was a time since the nation's birth when danger threatened upon every hand as now. The campaign upon which you are now entering will be fraught with weal or woe to the nation's life. See to it that your energies and influence are cast upon the side of right.

Now is the time to work for the best interests of the country, not for party but for the people. To your mothers, daughters, and wives are you responsible—ye who hav refused to them the means whereby they can protect themselvs; for if the ballot is a protection to man it is also to woman. To those whose interests it is your duty to protect are you responsible for the manner in which you cast your ballot. Weigh well the situation, for to neither of the political parties of the day can you look for protection. The aim of the one is the aim of the other—the thirst for power, and a rush for the spoils. It is to new principles and a new party that you must look for salvation; and see to it that the liberties which you value are perpetuated—which they will not be by either of the parties which are now in the field, for if in the struggle the party in power to-day holds sway you can only expect the continuance of the policy which is sapping the foundations of this republic; the policy that permits and fosters the accumulation of vast wealth in the hands of the few, to the financial ruin of the masses, is not the policy which should be sustained by a government of the people. On the other hand, the battle-cry of reform has a glorious sound; but what does it really mean? Only an open sesame to power and spoils.

Friends, radical changes are needed for the perpetuity of the government which was founded by our brave sires, who in the dark hour of peril shrank from no sacrifice. Their lives and sacred honor were freely laid upon the altar of liberty, and to you they look to continue the work so nobly commenced.

Another thought. The patriotic women of America, those whom birth and education hav placed on an equality with their brothers, should hav the ballot. While it may not be expedient at the present time to extend to all women—those from foreign shores, whose education, or want of it, has wholly unfitted them to appreciate or rightly use that sacred symbol of the free—yet to the intelligent women of the land it is a crime to deprive them of it. And your laws should be so amended that all emigrating from foreign shores should necessarily remain here the same number of years as your sons before the rights of citizenship could be conferred upon them. Make it an honor to be an American citizen; make it necessary that every voter should hav an intelligent understanding of the political situation, and make it a crime punishable by both fine and imprisonment both to buyer or seller of the ballot. Our schools should be broadened in their conception. Not only should professors of political economy be employed, teaching the fundamental principles of government and enabling the young to form correct ideas of both self and national government, that they may be fitted to use the privileges of citizenship wisely; there should also be attached to all schools branches of industry, wherein the various trades are taught, fitting and preparing the rising generation to be self-sustaining. One of the surest means of eradicating crime from the land is to instruct the young of both sexes in some honorable means of obtaining a living. Remove all incentivs to crime by industrious habits. Employed minds and hands seldom seek for amusement or recreation aside from the paths of virtue. A nation's safeguard and protection is the love of truth and honor that is implanted in the minds of the rising generation.

Truth and justice is our watchword;
Ever let it be
Guiding star of love and duty,
Banner of the free.

San Jose, Cal. MRS. J. L. YORK.

Christian Superstition in Italy.

A Naples correspondent writes to the London Standard: "In the province of Catania, Sicily, we are informed, the festival of San Filippo, the patron saint of Calatabiano, is celebrated in a strangely superstitious manner. The ignorant population of that district believe that San Filippo has the power of restoring to health all those afflicted with epilepsy, hysterics, insanity, or other nervous maladies—in short, that the invocation of the saint is sufficient to cast out the 'evil spirit.' On the day of the festival such afflicted persons from all the country around are brought by their relations to be cured instantaneously at the church of Calatabiano. On arriving they are seized by robust peasants, who attempt to make them kiss the image of the saint, and cry, 'Viva Sant Filippo.' Some, as might be expected, are too stupid to obey, some struggle furiously in the hands of their captors, who then resort to the most savage means of compulsion, tearing off their clothes, pulling their hair, and even biting them, continuing the torture throughout the day until the victims pronounce the sacramental words. This being accomplished, the unfortunate invalids are again consigned to their relations, who take them home with tears of joy, only to be bitterly undeceived by finding them later on worse than before. This year the same scene was repeated, but was soon put a stop to by a police constable, who in the name of the law arrested all those who refused to renounce the barbarous custom."

Defying the Order.

The recent decision of Mr. Ruggles, state superintendent of public instruction, on the question of religious exercises, is undoubtedly fresh in the memory of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers. His decision was given in answer to the Board of Education of Union Free School of Orangetown. This board applied to the superintendent for a decision, representing that it wished to "move unerringly, but firmly, in the matter of sustaining the reading of scripture and prayer" in opening the school. Children of Catholic families had not been required to participate in repeating the scripture or Lord's Prayer, but had simply been required to behave with decorum. The question was raised by a request made by a number of Catholic families that their children be permitted to remain outside the school until the devotional exercises were concluded. The board was unwilling to grant the request, because the "interference causes much disorder outside of the room, and the subsequent entrance of these pupils causes a loss of time and disturbance to class work." Hence the appeal to the superintendent for instructions.

Mr. Ruggles took the ground that the only course to be followed, if the benefits of the constitutional guarantees are to be preserved, and the absolute equality of right in matter of religious predilection secured, is to exclude religious instruction and exercises from the public schools during school hours. Mr. Ruggles bases his decision upon the constitutional guarantee of the absolute equality of all people in the state in respect to the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship. Instruction being free under the public school system, the material resources necessary for its maintenance hav to be drawn from a population characterized by dissimilar religious beliefs, observances, modes of worship, and preferences. It is impossible to devise a limited measure of religious instruction for the schools upon which all these classes and sects could harmonize, and, therefore, the exclusion of all religious instruction and exercises, in Mr. Ruggles's opinion, is the only alternativ.

When calling attention to this but a few weeks since, we predicted that no attention would be paid to it by the school authorities of the different districts, and in this we were right. The schools of this city are all opened with the reading of the Bible, and in some cases with religious hymns. This is done in obedience to a by-law of the board of education which makes it obligatory. The by-law is based on an old state law which went on the statute books of the state in 1851, the product of a compromise between Thurlow Weed and Archbishop Hughes.

City Superintendent Jasper told a Tribune reporter a week or more ago that Mr. Ruggles's decision was not heeded. "We hav had no trouble," he said, "for eighteen or twenty years on the score of religious exercises, and I do not think any will again arise. The teachers now obey the by-law on the subject and read each morning a portion of the scriptures without note or comment. I am bound to see the by-laws obeyed, and if a question should arise, I would refer it at once to the board. But I do not think trouble will come. It is to the interest of every principal to remain popular with the people whom he is among, and as a rule all principals study the wishes of the parents of their pupils. This guides them in the selection of the portions of scripture which are read. Usually they are from the Psalms, Ecclesiastes, or Proverbs, and are unobjectionable to any religious feeling. We do not call the exercises religious exercises at all. Attendance is, of course, obligatory, for the reading takes place in the first minutes after nine o'clock in the morning, and the general contentment among all classes and sects is shown by the fact that the tardiness of scholars throughout the city is only two per cent of the attendance, and this percentage is not made up of the same children day after day."

Every day shows more and more that there is no sense of decency or justice in the Christian heart. Old Thurlow Weed and Archbishop Hughes parceled out the schools, giving to each as much superstition as the parents would stand, finding a common ground in the middle of the Bible on which they agreed, and paying not the slightest attention to the rights of any but the two great sects of fetich worshipers. And now Mr. Jasper doesn't propose to change the program. Because the people submit without protest, he concludes they like the doses of damnation doled out to their children in the first few minutes of the morning session. An order of his official superior is set aside, and the Bible rises again triumphant. The mugwumps of Christianity are indeed in the ascendant!

The League Congress.

Why cannot the next Congress of the National Liberal League be held at Cassadaga Lake, immediately following the convention of the New York State Freethinkers' Association? Such a conjunction would insure a large attendance of Liberals who can not afford the time and money to attend two conferences. It would also enable the League delegates to ascertain the feeling of Liberals as to political and social combinations, and thus aid in determining the action of the League.

We somehow feel that the next Congress will be an important one, as affecting the life of the national body. Practically nothing has been accomplished the past year by the League, and but few new auxiliaries hav been organized. Another year of such inertia would paralyze the organization, and render precarious its very existence. By meeting with the New York state auxiliary, it may be stimulated to renewed activity, and by confining its attempts at reform to secular issues, and mapping out a program in accordance therewith and prosecuting it vigorously, the report of its officers at the Congress in 1885 might be worth traveling a few hundred miles to hear.

The change in place of meeting from Cleveland to Cassadaga Lake is not violent. The lake is only about three hours' ride east of Cleveland, and the delegates who could attend at the latter place would certainly come on to Cassadaga, as the state convention is likely to be not less interesting than any former one. To borrow the interrogation of our esteemed contemporary, Man, What say you, Men and Brethren?

Woman Suffrage.

Several states hav this spring taken legislativ action upon questions affecting the natural rights of the female portion of our citizens. In most cases—in all where the right of suffrage was asked—the verdict has been adverse to woman. In Iowa both houses refused to even submit to popular vote a proposed constitutional amendment relating to the issue. In Massachusetts the adverse vote was 144 to 50; but a small gain in that state can be chronicled in women being allowed to practice medicin—something of a step for a commonwealth so bigoted as Massachusetts to take. In New Jersey the proposition led to a facetious debate in the house, and that is all. In Oregon, a state whose newness led people to look for a little display of justice, the popular vote is stated to be about three to one against the women. In this state only eight votes were lacking in the Assembly to submit the matter to the people, who must pass upon it in the shape of a constitutional amendment. In Utah the women may vote, but a bill disfranchising them is now pending in Congress.

In Pennsylvania, Mrs. Carrie Kilgore, a Freethinking woman, with a Freethinking husband, has compelled a reluctant court to admit her right to practice law. Mrs. Miller also forced the United States authorities to issue a steamboat captain's certificate to her, she passing the examination required of Mississippi pilots. These two victories, and the privilege of practicing medicin in Massachusetts, are the only substantial gains made.

A Franchise bill is now pending in England to which an amendment was made including the principle of woman suffrage, but Mr. Gladstone declared that the government would desert the bill if the amendment was tacked to it, and Parliament voted the amendment down—271 to 135. Oxford University, however, during the past year, has opened its honor grades to women, thus, in some small measure, atoning for Mr. Gladstone's unjust conduct.

Notwithstanding these defeats, we predict that it will not be twenty-five years ere the people of this country and England will comment unfavorably upon the conduct of their fathers in denying woman a right they will then concede she is as much entitled to as the men.

More Nominations.

The Liberal papers thus far hav maintained a stern silence as to our nomination for president of the League, which puzzles us, as they are not wont to keep still on matters pertaining to Liberalism. If any of them are acquainted with a better man for the position than Mr. Putnam, we hope they will not be shy in mentioning him. But if Mr. Putnam is not the man they desire, what would they say to this nomination for the presidency?—

HORACE SEAVER,
of Boston, Mass.,

who has for so many years edited one of the best Freethought papers in the world. Or if a man of national reputation is demanded, why not elect

JAMES PARTON,
of Newburyport, Mass.,

if he will serve, and some young, energetic man like Mr. Putnam for secretary?

The Belgian Election.

Belgium, with its five and a half millions of population, mostly Walloons and Flemings, has a large secular citizenship of the sort that goes to the polls and puts its convictions into the shape of ballots. But the valorous band hav been defeated by the very party that will one day or other make trouble for the American citizen—the Catholics. Political parties in Belgium consist of the Radicals, the Clericals, and the Liberals. The Radicals are the extreme secularizationists; the Clericals are Catholics, the Liberals standing midway between, with a pronounced leaning toward the Radicals The Protestant population is only about 15,000, mostly Calvinists. For long years the Clericals hav been out of power, though pushing the Liberals hard. The population of Belgium is chiefly Catholic, and on a measure for the revision of the constitution the Radicals could muster only eleven votes. But the Liberals needed aid in other measures, and to gain it made concessions which alarmed the Catholics and united them in the election which has just returned the old Clericals to power. The chief issue in this contest has been the secularization of education.

Previous to the recent election the government was substantially anti-clerical and secular. There is no state church in Belgium; ecclesiastical appointments are exempt from government control; and religious liberty is guaranteed by the fundamental law. These principles, if logically carried out, would render educational institutions not only tolerant, but strictly secular. As long ago as 1850 the lycées, or intermediate schools, were reorganized on the basis of secular or lay instruction. In the primary schools the influence of the clergy remained supreme. They not only taught the catechism, but directed the course of instruction and selected the books. The Liberals revised in 1879 the Education laws, resorting to the same compromise which had been effected in the intermediate schools. They did not prohibit religious instruction, but they restricted it to certain hours and required the clergy to confine themselvs to the catechism. The clergy were no longer allowed to choose the books and to control the courses of education. The primary, like the intermediate schools, were released from ecclesiastical domination.

The religious sympathies of the Liberal party are mainly with the Radicals, and a complete secularization of Belgium's schools might hav been looked for had not this national disaster overtaken her. But Catholicism is bound to go sooner or later, and as Protestantism does not seem to flourish on Belgian soil, Liberalism must ultimately win back the position it has temporarily lost. Indeed, the opinion is generally prevalent that the Catholics will not dare undo the good work already accomplished, for fear of uniting against them all the disaffected political forces, cutting short their lease of power. It is feared that an attempt will be made to re-establish the relations of the Vatican with the government, but this would probably lead to the reorganization of the ministry, and though the Catholic press of neighboring countries advise not only this but the recommittal of the schools into the hands of the priests, it is not likely to be immediately attempted.

Bradlaugh Defeated Again.

The indictment against Mr. Bradlaugh on this occasion was for sitting and voting in the House of Commons as a member for Northampton, after administering the oath to himself, and after having been verbally ejected by the speaker. The "crime" charged is misdemeanor, and the jury has found him guilty on all the counts.

Of course it is disappointing to Mr. Bradlaugh. He certainly has right and justice on his side, and law that leaves these defenseless is tyranny of the most odious kind. Mr. Bradlaugh had what seemed to him good grounds for expecting a different verdict; but the one given only confirms the impression fast spreading that in England a Freethinker has no rights the Christian is bound to respect. The result of the trial, the cable reports, is everywhere regarded by the orthodox as a triumph of Christianity over Atheism. On the night of the rendering of the verdict, one of the Queen's counsel—spoken of as a veteran—said, "It is illogical, but it is legal, and the fact is that reverence for the forms of Christianity has become an ingrained part of English common law." It is doubtful if this eminent lawyer realized the full import of his words, and what they really meant, which is that the church "tried" Mr. Bradlaugh, and not the court. But that it is true there appears no room to doubt. England is a good deal more concerned in this verdict than Mr. Bradlaugh can be, even though it should result in bankrupting him or sending him to prison.

The case will be carried to the Court of Appeals, and the defendant is preparing a long list of exceptions to the ruling of the court. The Freethinkers of England are contributing generously to defray the expenses. Mr. Bradlaugh is in no wise daunted, and the unequal struggle of one man against the great English government will be continued while life holds, or until the victory is won.

Editorial Notes.

Some time ago the Canadian Methodist Magazine printed an article by the Rev. W. Harrison, in which that writer quoted a London journal to the effect that "of twenty Infidel lecturers and writers, sixteen hav abandoned their Infidelity and openly professed their faith in Christ and their joy in his salvation." Why the London journal took the number twenty out of which to distinguish sixteen hypocrits is not known. He might hav taken three hundred—there are probably that number of Freethinkers in England as prominent as those mentioned; but the object was doubtless to show that four out of five had recanted. This was the first fraud in the matter. The Christian Advocate, of this city, copied the article referred to. Dr. Aveling, of London, took the subject up and showed (1) that not all the persons claimed had recanted; and (2) that scarcely one was a representativ Infidel. The editor of The Truth Seeker wrote to the editor of the Advocate, admonishing him of these facts and asking for a correction. This is the way the Advocate printed his letter:

"To the Editor of the Christian Advocate, Dear Sir: I see that in your issue of March 27th, you reprint from the Canadian Methodist Magazine an article of the Rev. W. Harrison, in which he quotes a London journal to the effect that of twenty Infidel lecturers and writers, sixteen hav abandoned their Infidelity and openly professed their faith in Christ and their joy in his salvation. Allow me to say that this is incorrect. In the —— —— of Oct. 20, 1883, the paper of which I hav the honor to be the editor, I printed a long and complete refutation of this charge of apostasy so industriously circulated in England and in this country. If the story is not absolutely without foundation, it is so nearly so as to come under the stereotyped heading 'Christian Falsehoods.' As you hav given the wrong information to your readers, I shall expect you in justice to your readers in this country and in England to print the correction. Yours, for humanity, —— ——."

The omissions denoted in the foregoing by dashes are "The Truth Seeker" and "E. M. Macdonald." Dr. Buckley (editor of the Advocate) devotes three columns to the subject, leaving it finally exactly where it stood before, with the exception that he knocks off two from the Rev. Mr. Harrison's statement, and admits that only fourteen recanted from their Infidel opinions. We cannot help admiring the courage of Dr. Buckley in advocating a cause in which he must necessarily make so feeble a defense. What we can complain of, however, on behalf of the readers of the Advocate, is his omissions in his published copy of our letter. The name of The Truth Seeker, at least, should hav been printed, that the religious public might know who it is that the Rev. Dr. Buckley is discussing this question with. If the fear was that some good Methodist might obtain a copy of this paper and thereby hav his convictions shaken, then Dr. Buckley has little confidence in the stability of those convictions when assaulted by the logic of Freethought. In this respect the Advocate is far behind the Catholic Union. That paper prints The Truth Seeker in italics whenever it feels inclined to call it a vile Ingersollite or blasphemous sheet, which occurs nearly every week. Dr. Buckley adds that "some of the ablest Infidels we hav ever known hav renounced Infidelity and become Christians." Will Dr. Buckley giv their names and testimony to that effect, "not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith?" The fact is that Freethinkers do not become believers except under some strong religious excitement, which, as in the case of Bishop Snow, weakens their intellect and takes away their reasoning faculties.

Considering Sir John Lubbock's bill to restrict the hours of labor in England to twelve, Mrs. Besant says: "A day of twelve hours is brutal. Suppose a 'young person works for twelve hours; he or she, if 'young,' ought to hav at least nine hours' sleep; a growing animal needs many hours of repose. But if, out of the twenty-four, twelve hours are to go to labor and nine to sleep, what is left for education, for play? If the law fixes twelve hours as a 'fair day,' that law will largely govern custom. I declare that a 'legal day' should be eight hours on five days in the week, and not more than five hours on the sixth. If the labor is of an exhausting character, these hours are too long. For a shop, with its constant breaks of employment, they are fair; but if labor is to be continuous, these should be shortened. How can the producers become educated and refined if they are to be worn out by physical labor, and given no opportunity for mental endeavor? Full education, and time also for mere play, are the rights of every human being. That such a claim should seem exorbitant is the condemnation of our present social system. There ought to be none who has not the opportunity of appreciating all that is fair in nature and in art. And it must be remembered that 'opportunity' includes the precedent culture which is necessary to such appreciation."

Religious prejudices become involuntarily beneficial when they are exercised in the interests of justice. For instance, the reading of the Bible and other religious exercises in the public schools of Sharon and Sharpsville, in Mercer Co., Pa., will probably result in a law suit. The Roman Catholics complained to the bishop of Erie, the Right Rev. Tobias Mullen, that the teachers and directors of the Sharpsville and Sharon public schools were compelling their children to attend objectionable religious exercises upon pain of expulsion. The bishop advised the Catholics to keep their children out of school until after the devotional exercises. The teachers punished this tardiness by expulsion. The state superintendent of instruction did not sustain this action. The Catholics will now go to the courts to compel the discontinuance of all religious exercises and the reading of the Bible in the public schools.

Mr. Remsburg held, during the past week, at Stewartsville, Mo., a debate with the Rev. Mr. Green, a champion of the church. Of Mr. Remsburg's lecture at Davenport, Iowa, Der Demokrat of that place says: "Mr. John E. Remsburg held his third and last lecture in the German Theater last evening, His, 'False Claims,' was one of the grandest lectures of the three he gave in this city. The speaker pointed out nearly all the claims of the churches, and he plainly and forcibly demonstrated that they were false. Mr. Remsburg leaves for Chicago this morning, and he will in the next few weeks lecture in different cities of Illinois and Wisconsin. May he soon return. His lecture of yesterday has made him many friends, of which the lively applause frequently interrupting him yielded evidence."

Grace Church, in this city, has for years been minus an appropriate spire. A subscription of $50,000 was therefore raised, and up to June 24th a marble steeple had reached the hight of 171 feet. Then the foot of the derrick, used for hoisting the stones, slipped, and a workman named Simpson was caught beneath a rope and killed. Another man was severely injured, and a shower of huge stones, knocked loose by the arm of the derrick, went crashing through the roof of the edifice, doing some five thousand dollars' worth of damage. An $800 window was shattered by a swinging rope. Whatever was the design of this accident, it is beyond doubt a dispensation of Providence, and the religious world will now proceed to bring forth the royal diadem and crown him Lord of all.

A Food Reform Society has been organized in this city, about twenty-five persons meeting at Dr. Holbrook's Hygienic Hotel one day last week for that purpose. Dr. Holbrook was chosen president. One speaker announced that only about one-tenth of the Americans were healthy, and that the consumption of animal flesh was the cause of this state of things. Mr. Henry Chubb, a Quaker, contended that the eating of meat was against the teachings of the Bible! Well, who cares if it is? The main question to be considered is whether the eating of animal flesh is detrimental to health. Experience has not yet proved that it is—or that it is not.

The Catholic Union and Times, of Buffalo, demands the legal suppression of Ingersoll. Somehow our pious contemporary don't seem to hav "caught on to" the spirit of Americanism, but plods along as though it were enjoying the times of Philip the Second and Torquemada, when the roasting or racking of a few thousand heretics was only a pleasant diversion for the faithful. And our p. c. also tags right on after the pope in his Quixotic crusade against the Masons. What a curious physiological phenomenon it is, that when an old codger in Rome takes snuff some six or seven millions of people three thousand miles away should all sneeze in concert!

It is the opinion of the editor of the Methodist organ that provided dancing is prohibited, "there is no good reason why a picnic may not be a means of grace." Historical accuracy impels the remark that few things hitherto, except Methodist camp-meetings, hav proved a more prolific source of disgrace than the average religious picnic. Dancing is by no means the worst thing about it.

The board of commissioners hav decided to no longer pay $1,200 per year for a preacher in the insane asylum on Ward's Island, and whoever wishes to officiate in the capacity of chaplain for that institution will hereafter do so free of charge. We shall now see how much interest is taken in the salvation of the souls of lunatics, apart from a money consideration.

Heretofore blasphemy has not been considered a legal offense in New Zealand, but a new code is being considered by the colonial parliament into which the Christians hav injected this "crime." The Freethinkers of the colony are vigorously protesting through their paper, the Freethought Review.

The coming Plenary Council of Roman Catholic Primates, to be held at Baltimore, will discuss the subject of "Round Dances," and the "Duty of the Church to the Negro." In respect to the latter, we would suggest that the let-alone doctrin would prove the most profitable to the colored man.

Congregations are now sending their pastors into the country and to foreign parts for a few months. Ostensibly this is to giv the preachers a respit, but if the truth were divulged it would probably be found that it is merely a dodge of a suffering people to get a little rest for themselvs.

The Chicago Tribune dubs the Independent Republicans "George William Curtis's Salvation Army." Nothing needs salvation more just now than politics. Some of the political candidates are especially in need of it.

Literary Notices.

G. P. Putnam's Sons hav in press a volume by Capt. R. C. Adams, entitled, "Travels in Faith, from Tradition to Reason." Price, $1.25.

Wm. Hanson has written, and the Fowler & Wells Co., are publishing a book entitled "The Fallacies in Progress and Poverty." It is expected to be an answer to Mr. Henry George.

Mr. R. S. Sidelinger, of Boston, writes to Mr. Putnam as follows: "I hav read your 'Waifs and Wanderings,' the story that has been running through The Truth Seeker. I must let you know that I think it is one of the grandest productions that I ever had the pleasure of reading. The scene at the death of Columbus was fine, grand!" "Waifs and Wanderings" is soon to be issued in book and pamphlet form. In paper covers the price will be 50 cents; cloth, handsomely bound, $1.00

The Popular Science Monthly for July, has a long and very interesting article by Herbert Spencer on "The Great Political Superstition;" a statement of the advantages and disadvantages of Colorado for invalids, by S. A. Fisk, M.D.; an exposition of the "New Theology," by a Rev. Mr. Lyon, who makes it out to be an improvement and purification of the old; a paper by Grant Allen on "Our Debt to Insects," and ten other essays of more or less permanent value. Taken year in and year out, the Popular Science is one of the very best of the monthlies.

The Freethinkers' Magazine for July is a good average number. Among the more noticeable articles are those of S. P. Andrews, Elizur Wright, George Chainey, A. B. Bradford, and our voluminous correspondent, Elliott Preston, who contrasts Buddhism with Christianity in its protection of the lower animals. Mr. Andrews's dissection of reforms and reformers is spicy reading, and Mr. Wright has considered the evils of Sunday laws in his well-known incisiv way. Mr. Bradford livs a good deal in the past, and the lessons he learned in Abolition days are valuable hints for the present. We expect eloquence and beauty from Chainey, and his short communication in no wise disappoints the expectation. Rumors are in the air that Mr. Green intends to locate in Liberal, Mo., but this number of his Directory fails to confirm them.

Some suggestions for the improvement of the existing jury system are presented by Judge Robert C. Pitman in the North American Review for July, under the title of "Juries and Jurymen." "American Economics" are expounded by Professor Van Buren Denslow. Judge Noah Davis writes of "Marriage and Divorce;" Dr. P. Bender, whose subject is "The Annexation of Canada," sets forth the advantages likely to accrue to the United States from the absorption of the Canadian provinces; Professor D. McG. Means, in an argument "Government Telegraphy," subjects the management of the post-office to a most searching criticism; Charles T. Congdon writes of "Private Vengeance;" and, finally, there is a symposium on the "Future of the Negro," by Senator Z. B. Vance, Frederick Douglass, Joel Chandler Harris, Senator John T. Morgan, Professor Richard T. Greener, Gen. S. C. Armstrong, Oliver Johnson, and others, which is interesting reading. The North American Review can be ordered through this office. Single numbers are 50 cents; $5 per year.

Locating a Baptist.

April 11th, W. F. Malden, of Casseta, Ga., wrote us:

"The Rev. J. H. Fackler, Baptist, of Lumpkin, Stewart Co., Ga., was excluded lately from the Baptist church for drunkenness, lying, abusing his wife, and bigamy. Under the name of J. H. Price he is now somewhere in the West. He is also advertised in the Christian Index. I know the man well."

June 18th, A. Butterfield, of Ingalls, Kan., locates Mr. Price. He says:

"Price is preaching a little way west of here. It is the same chap. He had to run away from Iowa on account of seducing a young girl, and I think he will leave here soon for swindling some three or four different parties."

Letters from Friends.

RAYMOND, June 14, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $4, which place to my account. I am glad of the move of Sister Elmina to investigate Spiritualism. But if she has not got the bug out of her ear that made its way in there when she was on a visiting tour some time ago, I should like to hav her rise and explain, because according to her own report she then made she could not account for what she received from the strange medium whom she visited. Now if what little she then received cannot be accounted for, what is the need of more evidence from the same source?

We hav a good many Liberal people in this part of Kansas —Materialists, Spiritualists, etc.—but they are too much like myself—too much wood about them.

Yours for free speech, free press, free mails, and equal taxation, C. W. NOLAND.

GALT, ONT., June 16, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am highly pleased with your paper, and will always subscribe. I hav been kept busy reading books that friends gave me. I hav some sweet times talking religion to my companions, who are commencing to think the same. I am now an enemy of religion. There is plenty of it here, Salvation Army and Gospel Army. They make quite a stir on Sundays, and if they go to heaven I think I will. They are a terrible class. If I saw you I could tell you better. Mr. Laird helps me on, and what I don't know he tells me. There are quite a few Freethinkers here, although they won't say anything. But I can't keep it in, and will not as long as I liv. I hav been reading up Ingersoll's works, and they are immense. I am a barber, and hav plenty to talk too. Some think I should not talk religion, as it will injure business. But if I do my work right, religion will make no difference. I will close at present, and will do what I can for THE TRUTH SEEKER. J. D. BRUCE.

CINCINNATI, O., June 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav but little time to write, in consequence of a rush of business. But hard work and clear thoughts are often close company. Now, friend Macdonald, I do find in Freethought papers what seems to me the very reverse of clearness of thought. From my standpoint, much of it looks about as clear as mud, and how such opaque ideas can emanate from anything claiming to be sane, is to me a puzzle. Now were we not all born? Yes, that is one fact; and do we not now liv? Yes, that is another fact; and another and positiv fact is that we shall die. These three facts are clear and manifest. None can dispute or deny it, and neither before the first fact or the last is anything positivly known. We exist from moment to moment by nature's forces acting by and through organic matter, and so long as that organism is unimpaired by any cause or causes, life is intact, and works its way physically and mentally to the end. And whenever the lungs cease to respire, and breathing is no more, that, sir, is death! And beyond this last and final fact nothing is or can be known, and all the strange and proofless assertions to the contrary are the result of misconceptions, false conclusions, or wilful and perverse inclinations, growing out of ignorance, or a plastic mind easily controled by clerical sophisty or cunning trickery. Sir, Materialism is as clear as the noon-day sun. But every phase of supernaturalism is a fog bank, and those who would be wise should wash the blinding bandage of superstition from their minds, and clearly see that Materialistic philosophy is the standard of truth, and all should follow it as a grand and solid thing for happiness.

T. WINTER.

June 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Imagin my surprise last Sunday morning when I opened your paper to find a private letter I sent you published. Allow me to giv you the medal as the prince of blunderers, as I much rather the article mentioned would not hav been published. But I hav learned the fact that if you want a mistake made in handsome shape, giv it into the hands of a man. Instinct belongs to woman, reason to man. But allow me to express my private opinion by saying instinct is superior to reason. A man may theorize a month, and nine times out of ten he will accept the first opinion of his wife.

If it is a fact that you object to private letters from ladies, I will hereafter stamp all my correspondence to you with indelible ink, "Public!" I will forgiv the offense by your publishing this explanation. The trouble I mentioned was not, as I seemed to infer, a public move, but from a private individual, whose family are said to belong to the Catholic church, a family whose ignorance and superstition can hardly be equaled—people who are not satisfied to believe in a future hell, but keep up a miniature hell here, hot enough to raise tropical fruits for a mile square.

Our Board of Education is composed of men and women who are courageous enough to dare to do right, and when they face a man who is black in nature, though he may be white externally, they dare to say, "Get thee behind me, Satan."

The world moves on, and the ungentlemanly wretch who made such a desperate effort to giv me a rest found he was playing barn-ball, and no one hurt but himself. His present appearance reminds me of a dilapidated rooster after a thunder shower. In the language of Peck, I am a Liberal from head to foot, now and ever more, independent as the day is long, and a firm believer in a heaven and hell, devils and angels of love and mercy, here on earth. Having all these on hand, it seems a waste of time to look farther. While the religious creeds seem like so many dark demons that hold their victims with a mesmeric grasp, powerless by reason of early education and surroundings, still we as Liberals should entice them out of the darkness, and into the broad road of light, into channels of new thought, by love and kindness, instead of fire and smoke and the cruel jest. I hav but the kindest of feelings for the honest Christian. That I am not one is simply a streak of good luck. An investigating disposition and a lack of faith was my savior. SEE MORE.

MELVIN VILLAGE, N. H., June 23, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find three dollars, for which please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. I am rather behind the times in not renewing my subscription sooner, but did not intend to be. And I cannot tell you how much I hav missed its weekly visits. It is but a very short time since I commenced to take your valuable paper, and it has been to me indeed an intellectual feast, and to take it once is with me to want to take it always. So you may count me as a life-long subscriber. I am alone, as it were, in Freethought. I hav many foes to fight. It is truly astonishing with what tenacity the people hold their creeds and dogmas here, and I am opposed in my own family. My husband is against me in my opinions, as it is not the way that he has been taught to believe.

I attended a funeral yesterday, and to prove the literal resurrection of the dead the preacher said that Aaron's rod budded and blossomed, and bore fruit, and he spoke of the golden pot of manna that kept fresh for hundreds of years. That is the kind of doctrin that suits best here. Yet I think there are some, if they would be honest, and would dare to tell what they think, who would not believe the Bible. There are a great many hypocrits who belong to the church for the sake of being popular. I hav a little son who attends church and Sabbath-school. He has no other society. There is no other for him. And the seeds of error are being sown in his young mind, which in later years will be hard to eradiate. Yet his father wishes it, and the circumstances are such that I cannot very well control them.

It was my good fortune to hav an Infidel father, who, when I was very young, tried to instil into my mind principles of truth which I hav never forgotten—that the Bible is not the word of God, but an imposition on the world, and reading it myself has convinced me that it is so.

Wishing you every success, I remain, yours ever in the cause of truth and mental liberty, MRS. MARY A. HORNE.

A LETTER TO MISS WIXON, FROM A SPIRITUALIST.

SOUTH ROYALTON, VT., June 17, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav just read in THE TRUTH SEEKER your very touching article on "Our Susie." I cannot keep silent. You say, "If that bright, intelligent mind continues in conscious existence, we shall some day see her again." Yes, my friend, you will see her. There is no room for doubt. That darling spirit is near you every hour when you think of her. All our loved ones who hav left us in the form are still watching over us to bless us. I know, and therefore must speak. My heart goes out in deepest sympathy to all who mourn the loss of dear kindred and friends. I wish to tell everybody what I do know, that their hearts may be comforted. All alone in my humble home they (spirit friends) come to me. I wish I could find words to express my joy and happiness in communing with the bright spirits that come to me. It is as near a heaven as I ever expect to enjoy, even in the sweet summer-land. Why, my friend, when H. B. A. was with us on a visit a few years ago we were blessed with the presence of more than sixty old neighbors, friends, and relativs. They not only spoke their names, but shook hands as heartily as when in the form, and expressed great joy to meet us again; also wrote letters full of affection and instruction to us all, with spirit hands. Now, these are truths which we know. There is no guess-work or mistake in what I write you. I know that those called dead are more alive than when in fleshly bodies. Oh, that every aching heart could know and believe these glorious facts as I myself do! To me there is no death in all this mighty universe. Life—life immortal and progressiv to the endless ages of eternity—is the rich boon of humanity. How can any student of nature fail to read the great and glorious facts which she teaches in the tiniest blade of grass, or in the ever-shining orbs over our heads, which are "Forever singing as they shine,

The hand that made us is divine."

With best wishes, your friend, MRS. H. J. SEVERANCE.

LOUDONVILLE, N. Y., June 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It has been a long time since I wrote to the dear old TRUTH SEEKER, and I want to do so to-day, to thank Mr. Preston for his efforts in behalf of anti-vivisection, and you, Mr. Editor, for pubishing his articles on the subject.

I confess that the reading of those same articles was harrowing in the extreme to my nerves. I thought I would not read them, but sometimes the horrible has such a fascination, you know. I hope Mr. Preston will continue to agitate the subject, with your help, and thus giv it an airing and publicity which it so richly deserves.

There is scarcely a medical work or journal that does not contain reference to some vivisector's experiments. I would rather die by slow suffering, pain, and torture than that one poor little dumb rabbit or faithful little dog should suffer torture that I may liv. Moreover, I don't believe that the doctors learn much by such inhuman processes, anyway. It is more to satisfy curiosity and the developed boyish fiendishness that liked "to see 'em wiggle." It's a proclivity of your sex, Dr. Foote, to which "vivisection for scientific purposes" is a plausible excuse. Medical colleges are not all of the nice character of the ones the doctor is acquainted with, nor are all the students of his bent of character, unfortunately.

It is really kind of the doctor to be so solicitous of our nerves, and I doubt not he is a great friend of ours, but really, you know, one does not like a sneering reference to one's "weakness," even by one's best friend, and the doctor's way of referring to our sex was scarcely chivalrous.

Although THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL has laid on my table since last March, it was not until last week that I gave it a thorough perusal, and considered my time well spent in so doing. The character sketch of "Big Jack Small" was well worth the price of the book, let alone the information, dates, etc., it contains.

I found but one fault, and laid it down with a sense of disappointment that Ella E. Gibson's name was not in the list of prominent Freethinkers and reformers. No one acquainted with her writings and labor in behalf of Freethought can disclaim the justice of her name being in the list. She has written, lectured, and talked for years, sometimes for no compensation, and in most cases for scarcely enough to meet her expenses. Laid on a bed of pain and weariness nearly all the time for the past three years or more, her greatest sorrow is that she cannot be at her life work—fighting old theology.

With best wishes for the prosperity of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I remain Truly yours, WINEFORD V. ASPINWALL.

[The omission of Miss Gibson's name was an oversight that can be remedied next year.—ED. T. S.].

HELENA, MON., June 18, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Knowing that many of your Western readers personally knew and loved my late wife, I send the accompanying obituary and poem for publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Respectfully yours, C. B. VAUGHAN.

DIED.—At Helena, Mon. Ter., June 4, 1884, Jessie, wife of C. B. Vaughan, aged 33 years. Mrs. Vaughan was formerly Mrs. Dr. A. A. Howard, and had many friends in Nebraska, Nevada, and California. The following poem expressiv of her belief was read at her funeral:

THERE IS NO DEATH.

There is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore;
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forevermore.

There is no death! The dust we tread
Shall change, beneath the summer showers,
To golden grain or mellow fruit,
Or rainbow-tinted flowers.

The granit rocks disorganize
To feed the hungry moss they bear;
The forest-leaves drink daily life
From out the viewless air.

There is no death! The leaves may fall,
The flowers may fade and pass away;
They only wait through wintry hours
The coming in of May.

There is no death! An angel form
Walks o'er this earth with silent tread;
He bears our best-loved things away,
And then we call them "dead."

He leaves our hearts all desolate,
He plucks our fairest, sweetest flowers;
Transplanted into bliss, they now
Adorn immortal bowers.

The bird-like voice, whose joyous tones
Made glad these scenes of sin and strife,
Sings now an everlasting song
Amid the tree of life.

And when he sees a smile too bright,
Or heart too pure for taint and vice,
He bears it to that world of light,
To dwell in Paradise.

Born into that undying life,
They leave us but to come again;
With joy we welcome them—the same,
Except in sin and pain.

And ever near us, though unseen,
The dear, immortal spirits tread;
For all the boundless universe
Is life—there is no dead.

MR. EDITOR: Suppose Talmage was a shoemaker, but had a religious literary bend of mind, and that no one encouraged him by substantial means to change his vocation. Suppose, further, that some godly man died, a relation of Talmage's, and left the following last will:

"In the name of God, Amen! I, being of sound mind, do bequeath to my children and their heirs and assigns all the prayers I hav made for their welfare during the last forty years. I bequeath to them the result of all my lifetime toil in their behalf. I bequeath to them the Christian religion, that has done so much to comfort my sorrows, in the hope it may comfort them in their sorrows. I bequeath to them a hope of reunion in the land where there shall be no parting. May they share and share alike in eternal riches. I bequeath to them the wish that they may avoid my errors and keep anything that may hav been right. In the name of the God who made me and the Christ who redeemed me, and the Holy Ghost who sanctified me, I make this last will and testament. Witness all the hosts of heaven. Witness time. Witness eternity. Signed, sealed, and delivered in this, my dying hour, with the love and tears of father or mother."

Suppose, finally, that some ungodly man, also a relation of Talmage's, died at the same time, and left this last will:

"In the name of God, Amen! I being of sound mind, do make this my last will and testament: I bequeath to my children all the money that I hav made and all the houses that I hav built; but I rob them of what I got from my father. I hav squandered that by my own impenitent and worldly life. Let my children share and share alike in the disappointment and the injustice and the everlasting outrage. Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of God and man, and angels and devils, and all the generations of earth and heaven and hell. January, 1884."

The question is (as we know Talmage to be a pious man, even in his shoemaking vocation), which of the two wills would he accept, or would he remain by his "last" and refuse the houses, etc., which the so-called ungodly man bequeathed to Talmage? The question is not fair, I think, because the answer is clear. And yet both wills are Talmage's own words of January 6th, on the Lord's day, at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. The text was from Samuel—"Whose son art thou, thou young man?" I must confess with me the choice would be easy enough, and unless Talmage be an angel of angels he would like to accept the houses, and call the godly testator a fool of fools.

The Rev. Holy Dr. Talmage speaks also of holy nursery rhymes. I think I hav read considerable, including in part the Bible, even, but I never read or heard of a holy nursery rhyme in my life, and were a pious sister in the country to ask me to bring her a holy nursery rhyme book from a city, say Cincinnati, I fear that Thomas Winter even would be unable to direct me where to buy it, on this globe or in heaven.

MURRAY, O., June 22, 284.

MR. EDITOR: In accordance with your request in regard to "A Petition for State Secularization," I hav complied inasmuch as I hav signed it, and as many of my friends as I could induce. I might probably get more to sign the petition had not a certain event occurred in this place which can be briefly stated as follows: Murray is a small mining village depending entirely upon the one mine, isolated, as it were, from any other mine some four or five miles. The mine in question is one of a number of mines owned and controled by a "syndicate" known by the name of "C. & H. C. & I. Co." On the 9th inst., the "syndicate" suspended operation in this mine for an indefinit period, thereby necessitating the miners of this place to either remain at home and starve with their families, or go to the expense of moving away. Some hav gone one way, some another. As I said, had it not been for the above scattering of the men, I might hav been able to get more signers. As it is, I hav done the best I could. Inclosed find petition.

If it would not be intruding too much, I would like to insert a few quotations from a work that I am now reading, which I think will be interesting to some, for I am certain it was to me. The work is entitled, "Our Wild Indians: Thirty-three Years' Personal Experience among the Red Men of the Great West. A popular Account of their Social Life, Religion, Habits, etc." By Col. Richard Irving Dodge.

In writing about the religion of the Indian, the author, on page 100, says: "The Indian is as religious as the most devout Christian, and lays as much stress on form as a ritualist. He believes in two gods, equals in wisdom and power. One is the Good God. His function is to aid the Indian in all his undertakings, to heap benefits upon him, to deliver his enemy into his hand, to protect him from danger, pain, and privation. He directs the successful bullet, whether against the enemy or against the beasts of the field. He provides all the good and pleasurable things of life. Warmth, food, joy, success in love, distinction in war, all come from him.

"The other is the Bad God. He is always the enemy of each individual red man, and exerts to the utmost all his powers of harm against him. From him proceed all the disasters, misfortunes, privations, and discomforts of life. He causes all the pain and suffering; he brings the cold; he drives away the game; he deflects the otherwise unerring bullet; from him come defeat and wounds and death.

"The Good God is always the Indian's friend and assistant in everything that he wishes or proposes to do. If the Indian desires to steal a horse or the wife of a friend, to kill another Indian or raid a settlement of whites, it is the Good God to whom he turns for countenance; and it is by his assistance that he hopes to accomplish his purpose.

"The Bad God always thwarts; and from the lameness of a horse to final death, every annoyance, mortification, or disaster is attributed to the direct influence of the Bad God."

Further along in the same work, the author, on page 110, says: "There is a curious point of resemblance between the beliefs of the wild Indians and the Christian. Both believe in two great beings. The former believes in a God and a devil, equals in power and wisdom. Christians believe in an omnipotent and all-merciful God; but are so inconsistent as to believe in a devil, who, over human conduct and human souls, has ten times as much power as the Good God."

It will be thus seen that although there is a "curious point of resemblance" between the two beliefs, the wild Indian's is the most reasonable of the two.

"Ashamed to be a Christian!" I for one would be ashamed, and be classed by historians with the savage Indians of the West, and they one count ahead. We cannot be surprised at them for believing as they do; but for civilized people it is remarkably strange. They hav had no chance whatever of developing their reasoning faculties; while we hav every chance in the shape of colleges, the press, in fact, in almost any conceivable way; and yet with all the benefits of the latest inventions, discoveries, and so on, the Christians hav not advanced religiously beyond the wild Indians of the West. Not being satisfied with being back of the age themselvs, they want to put their God into the Constitution and keep us all back. Probably I hav made this letter too long, therefore I will conclude by signing myself,

Yours for state secularization, D. E. LEWIS.

WELLAND, ONT., June 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been induced to pen the following lines from the circumstance of some of my Quaker friends having made me the subject of discourse in their sermons, and also in some printed pamphlets, which they hav sent out, giving me an advertisment. While having one foot in the grave, and while a member of their religious society and indorsing their religious creed, I had mistakenly, like Mother Eve, given way to temptation, repudiated their religious creed, and resigned my right of membership in their society, which in their opinion would hav been my passport at the entrance-gate of some celestial city, the whereabouts of which I confess my ignorance. They, like myself, were brought up and trained to believe in a religious superstition founded upon a false basis, in the days of ignorance, and perpetuated by a cunning and designing priesthood, pretending to hav a sort of divine commission to act as agents for the Jewish Jehovah or Christian's God in expounding or explaining his will, as written in an old book (as they say by divine inspiration), but by whom or when written there is no satisfactory evidence to show; we know that Moses could not write an account of his death and burial, and science tells us that the creation story is not true; and that is the foundation upon which the whole fabric of the Christian religion rests; and, if the foundation is false, any system built upon it cannot be true.

But there can be no blame attached to those holding to the belief in such silly, impossible, and dogmatical views, when we consider that our characters hav been formed for us instead of by us, by our organization at birth and the circumstances and influences surrounding us from that time to the present. In our infancy and childhood, before our minds had begun to develop and were susceptible of being impressed with any ideas that our dear parents saw fit to teach or instruct us in, it would hav been just as natural and as easy to hav been trained in the religious creed of the Jew, the Mohammedan, the Buddhist, or any other, as that of the Christian; and how could we be to blame for being so trained, any more than we were to blame for the circumstance of our birth, as we had no control over any of these events? Having been taught from infancy the importance of implicit faith in any of these creeds, they hav become ours, and are, as it were, incorporated into our very being, and it is no easy matter to rid ourselvs of them. The first step is to begin to doubt their truthfulness, and this doubt leads to a more dilligent investigation, and in this we are led to see how easy it was for an ignorant people to draw upon their imaginations to account for things they did not comprehend. Hence, the creation of gods and spirits good and bad; and these myths we hav been taught to believe are real beings, without any good evidence of their being such other than imaginary.

In the same way arose a belief in witchcraft, which was as firmly believed in as any other spiritual phenomenon, and which cost the lives of many unfortunate homely-looking people, and others. It only required a higher degree of intelligence to rid ourselvs of the belief in witchcraft, and as the human race rises to a higher intelligence by becoming acquainted with the sciences and the laws of nature, a belief in kingcraft, ghostcraft, and priestcraft will follow in the same wake. We are evoluting toward that point, and it is only a question of time when it will be reached, though all the influence of self-interested parties, such as kings, priests, and ignorant church people will be raised in opposing the spread of a higher intelligence. It is hard work for self-interested parties to lose sight of their individual selfishness for the benefit of the human race. Perhaps my expression of these views may be far in advance for the less thinking part of the community to realize their truth, but they are not the less true for that. People require to be educated to hear and understand, as well as to speak and write. Though we hav all been endowed with a faculty for thinking, yet that faculty is but little employed by a very large number, except how to make a living and accumulate wealth, while the higher branches of our intellectual faculties are allowed to lie dormant.

It is fortunate for the human race that there hav been a few leading minds which hav been directed to scientific investigation, and hav arrived at conclusions founded upon facts that are capable of demonstration to be facts, and not dependent upon imagination or a creed-bound faith, and the number of these minds are greatly on the increase, as the light of scientific truth is being disseminated; it no longer satisfies an enlightened mind to profess to believe what he does not believe, or in a creed that he really knows nothing about. The difference between a scientist and a religionist is, the one knows and the other believes. To say, I believe, is only equal to saying, I don't know. All the faith in the world will not change a truth to an untruth, nor an untruth to a truth, though it is said to remove mountains, which is false, and if any one believes it will, let them try.

JOHN RAY.

HOBART, IND., June 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Is there any other thing in this world that comes so hard as it does to be truly "Liberal?" How plainly manifest the trouble is in writing on the questions that are discussed in THE TRUTH SEEKER; prohibition and the Bible, for instance. Some one writes an article on prohibition and portrays the evils resulting from the liquor traffic, and pleads for Liberals to take hold and help crush the monster body and soul; shows what a blight and mildew it is upon our fair land; what a hindrance it is to growth; how it stunts our youth, starves families, and impoverishes the many for the enrichment of a few, etc. We read and think what a splendid thing that is, and long for the ability to add our mite of influence in the same direction, and think, of course, every Liberal in the land will say Amen, and join hands in the warfare.

But, right in the next column, we will find an article from another Liberal, all on the other side of the question; somebody who almost flies all to pieces because somebody wants to interfere with his "personal liberty;" and from reading the essay one would be led to believe that alcoholic stimulants were the sum total of man's necessities. Who would dare to interfere with his right to do as he pleased? Whew! mercy! words are too weak to express the horror and disgust at the idea of such interference. He has a right to drink what he pleases; eat what and when he pleases, and read and write as he pleases. But go slow, and see what other rights he has. Isn't it astonishing? He claims not only the Liberal right of ruling his own conscience, but of ruling everybody else. Demands the right of abolishing Bibles, and tearing down religious institutions, and playing hob, generally, with everything he don't like.

I am, probably, very obtuse, but, for the life of me, I can't see why his liberty to drink is of so much more importance than some other person's liberty to read or believe as he pleases. I do not understand why the prohibition of the sale of alcohol is trespassing upon personal liberty, any more than the prohibition of the Bible in schools is trespassing upon the liberty of some conscientious Christian (for I believe there are such). I know old people whose most happy hours are spent in reading the Bible. They revere it; and do just as Christ commanded when he said, "Search the scriptures, for in them ye think ye hav eternal life." They do think eternal life is taught in them; and it is none of my business. I would not deprive them of their liberty to read their best loved book any sooner than I would an Infidel of reading Paine's "Age of Reason."

I make it my business to sign every protest I can against Christians forcing school-children to read or hear the Bible read in schools. I would just as readily sign a protest against having Spiritualism taught in the public schools; and against Materialism too. I do not believe in teaching "oxys" at all to children; they hav enough to learn, and beliefs will make themselvs in time, and they should be natural ones—not taught. And yet were I compelled to choose between the Bible or alcoholism, I would take the old book. A child, left to itself, would not read it enough to injure it, even though it saw every old lady and man in its vicinity reading it. But not so with spirits; the Bible only hurts those who indulge in it, but whisky hurts to the third and fourth generation. Belief in any certain direction is not absolutely incurable in a well-balanced mind; the effect of alcohol upon the children of habitual drinkers is that they are liable to hav their minds destroyed before birth, and not only that, but their bodies dwarfed and their forms racked with desease. I will not furnish Bibles for my children to read in public schools, neither will I compel them to attend in time for devotional exercises. I explain my motivs to teachers, and when they see I am honest in my convictions, they always respect my wishes in the matter.

I would not send children to school where they were taught that to deprive them of forming the opium habit, or arsenic habit, or tobacco habit, or any other habit whose whole tendency was evil, was an interference with their personal liberties.

Alcoholism is just as baneful as either, or all the others combined, and to restrict its sale is no more a trespass upon personal liberty than it is to compel men to refrain from selling poisoned meat, or tainted fish, or turning loose among our defenseless citizens a lot of rabid dogs, or wild animals unmuzzled and unrestrained.

I know one person who is a good illustration of this hobby of individual rights. He is so afraid his perfect freedom—to do as he pleases—is going to be encroached upon that he is the laughing-stock of his personal friends. He is one of the best men in the world, and intellectually rather above the average, but his personal freedom almost "gets away" with him. On one occasion he accompanied a party of ladies to a famous beach, where they were to spend the day. He could only stay to see them comfortably settled, when his business compelled him to return home. Before starting home he called his wife and said: "Now be sure to take the five o'clock boat. Do not forget it on any account. Do not let me worry about you. I must not be cramped by anxiety. I must hav everything just right, or I can't hav liberty." And he kept repeating this until one of the ladies said: "See here. Did it ever occur to you that it might encroach upon the liberty of some one of us six or eight women folks, all able to take care of ourselvs, and get home without any assistance from you, to take that five o'clock boat? There might be such a thing as our wishing to go sooner, or we might conclude to wait an hour longer on the beach. And in that case whose liberties should we consult—yours, to whom it cannot make one particle of difference, or our own? It is six to one, remember."

Sometimes this thing of personal liberty is a wonderful convenient thing to hav around. But I hav seen it used where it did not look well, to say the least. That kind of liberty-loving folks are generally pretty hard to liv with. They generally want all there is of it, and every body else is expected to toe the mark. There are several kinds of liberty that would be better were they somewhat fettered. Public opinion would be the most acceptable anchor, but if that can't be had, something else must do. Too much exclusiv liberty is not good for thieves, libertins, monopolies, priests, bosses, classes, castes, or males, either in the family or government. But all together do not compare in hideousness to crime-making establishments commonly called distilleries, and their outlets, saloons.

What would be thought of a community like this? A man has a lot of dog-berries. They are sweet, and our children like them. He gets a nice hall, and puts his poisoned candies up in fine style; puts screens to his doors, and flowers in his windows; has a fine band inside that discourses sweet music. Our little folks naturally run in. He shows his wares, and tells them to buy; it will made them dance, and sing, and feel wonderfully nice. They see some one who has eaten one. He is witty, and they laugh at him. The fellow behind the counter says, "Just one won't do you any harm; try it." They are persuaded. One is swallowed. Next day another. In a few days it takes two, and so on. The dose has to be increased until the fatal number is reached, and the victim dies in agony! How long would such an establishment be allowed to stand? Would the fathers and mothers stand idly by and declare that man's personal liberty to kill their children should not be interefered with? No, you know better. Lynching would be considered too good for him. And yet we hear people who claim to be capable of teaching truth and justice fairly ranting for fear just exactly such a traffic shall be interfered with. To my mind a person whose liberties depend in any degree upon the continuance of the liquor traffic, as it is carried on to-day, is in a deplorable condition, and should not be held up as an example for our children to copy; no matter whether he drinks the liberty-giving beverage or lets it alone. You say it don't hurt a stomach it does not come in contact with. No, but it does hurt the brains and body of the child of the man or woman who indulges in the use of it when begetting that child.

The rulers of Germany see these evils, and make it a crime for a boy under sixteen or eighteen years of age to use spirituous or malt liquors, as it unfits him for the army and other athletic pursuits.

How long shall woman weep, and youth debase himself, while men make laws making it possible for a man to hav a good moral character, and at the same time make fools of men and paupers of whole families? ELVIRA L. HULL.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

The Children's Hour.

Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour.

I hear in the chamber above me
The patter of little feet,
And the sound of a door that is opened,
And voices soft and sweet.

From my study I see in the lamp-light,
Descending the broad hall-stair,
Grave Alice, and laughing Allegra,
And Edith with golden hair.

A whisper, and then a silence,
Yet I know by their merry eyes,
They are plotting and planning together,
To take me by surprise.

A sudden rush from the stairway,
A sudden raid from the hall!
By three doors left unguarded
They enter my castle wall!

They climb up in my turret,
O'er the arms and back of my chair;
If I try to escape, they surround me;
They seem to be everywhere.

They almost devour me with kisses,
Their arms about me entwine,
Till I think of the Bishop of Bingen
In his Mouse-Tower on the Rhine.*

Do you think, O blue-eyed banditti,
Because you hav scaled the wall,
Such an old mustache as I am,
Is not a match for you all?

I hav you fast in my fortress,
And will not let you depart,
But put you down into the dungeon,
In the round-tower of my heart.

And there I will keep you forever,
Yes, forever and a day;
Till the walls shall crumble to ruin,
And molder in dust away.

—Longfellow.

*Bingen is a town on the Rhine, where the river is narrow and runs between very high rocks. Mice-Tower (der Maeusethrum) is built upon them, and is so called from the belief that Archbishop Hatto, of Metz, who speculated in grain during a famin, was gnawed to death there by mice in the year 969.

Our Dog Spang.

Our dog Spang was a wonderful being, and attained a great reputation. He was a cross between the shepherd's dog and water spaniel, of medium size, jet black, with the exception of a streak of white upon one foreleg, and a gradual shading into yellow tufts of hair approaching the feet; and a pair of yellow eyebrows, which, at a distance, looked like an extra set of eyes.

This dog possessed a very friendly disposition; and was inclined to wag his caudal appendage before every stranger if in company with one of the family, for then he took it for granted that the person must be a friend or on intimate terms with us. Because of this trait, he was a general favorit, and enjoyed the good will of the whole village; was not often abused, and could visit anybody's yard without fear of insult or bad treatment. He was fond of children, and often would go to school to do tricks and play for the boys. His feats consisted of jumping through a hoop, shaking his paw, jumping over a stick if not held up too high, and quietly walking under it if it was, which would create rounds of merriment; but, above all else, he was a great diver and swimmer; he would paddle about in the water for hours, bringing out sticks, and diving to the bottom for stones that had been shown him, and he rarely got the wrong one if he was permitted to see it before it was thrown in. This was often done by breaking off a piece or in some way marking the rock. He would dive down and open his eyes under water, and hunt around until he got the right one. In my childish anxiety, I was often afraid the boys would drown him when in hunting, he would remain under water so long.

He was, in consequence of his training, very expert in duck-shooting. The river at certain portions of the year would be lined with squads of wild ducks, and the hunter would shoot them from the river bank, and no matter how far out, if a duck was hit and crippled, Spang would spring into the water and bring it to the shore. He did one act in this line that brought all his dog knowledge into play, and raised his reputation to the top notch of doghood in that region. It often happens that if a duck is shot, it will dive down, and feeling the instinct of death, will fasten into anything in the shape of grass or roots it may find, and thus held by a death grip, will not come to the surface, and hence be lost to the sportsman. Upon one occasion this happened to a hunter who had Spang with him. When his gun went off, down went the duck, and in pounced the dog (Spang could tell just as well as the hunter when a duck was hit), and swimming to the spot, he went round and round, watching for the crippled duck to come to the surface, and hav his fun in catching it, but no duck came. At last he got as near to the place as he could, where the duck had gone down, and up went his tail, and he slipped under the water like a streak, and in less time than I can write it, out he came with the dead duck in his mouth, and laid it at the hunter's feet. The man noticed that the duck's bill contained the roots and tuft of grass into which it had fastened its death grip. He was so astonished at this performance that, in relating it, he declared the dog knew more than he did! The sagacity of this act was the crowning glory of Spang's reputation as a duck hunter. He did another thing, however, that was much more important, and exhibited an equal or greater amount of shrewdness. My niece, at that time a mere child, on a Sunday visit, by some means ran away from her mother and the rest of the company, unnoticed by them for a time. She went around the corner of a storehouse at the side of which was a wharf for unloading boats; for some reason this child wanted to play in the water, and getting a stick, commenced striking into the canal. The dog probably heard the splashing of water, and he slipped around the corner and to the wharf. Just then the child was missed, and great fears were had that she might hav tumbled into the water from the wharf. To ascertain this in the shortest time, the company ran out upon a canal-bridge, from which place they could look down upon the dangerous wharf, where, to their astonishment, they beheld the child close to the water's edge striking into it, and Spang holding on to her clothing. She would occasionally strike at the dog, when he would let go, but the moment she turned to strike at the water he would take hold of her clothing, and try to pull her away. The company watched this performance with excited astonishment and wonder for several minutes, until my mother was able to get around the large storehouse, and secure the child in her arms. As soon as the child was safe, Spang jumped over the wharf, and swam from sixty to a hundred yards down the canal, and brought out her bonnet which she had dropped into it, and which he knew was floating away while he was preventing her from falling into the water. This lady remembers the faithful care of our dog Spang with emotions of thankfulness and affection to this day.

No matter what floated along that canal, if Spang saw it, out it must come; if he thought it useful he would bring it home; if not, it might lay upon the bank. A merchant one day threw into the canal two two-gallon bottles which had become dirty with linseed oil. Spang jumped in and brought them out, and carefully carried them by the neck, one at a time, and laid them at mother's feet. They were scalded out and used in the family for more than fifty years, a reminder of the many intelligent acts of this good dog.

The lesson to be drawn from this is to bring into view the laws of association; that is, association molds the character and develops intelligence in the animal world. All domestic animals are more intelligent by being associated with the highest intelligence, or man. The traits of character hav been taught and impressed upon certain domestic animals, and fitted them to be useful and proper associates. The dog, horse, etc., exhibit so much use because we hav bestowed so much care and affection on them. If you want animals to love you, you must love them. This principle extends to every creature, and I think that even a reptil can be made to care for and protect you if you can love and protect it. The Indian snake charmers prove this. It shows also that love is a universal elemental feeling which may be cultivated and exchanged, one with another, until we insensibly glide into that happy frame of mind which produces that supreme state known as the love of universal nature. The mind will then rest satisfied, and will regard the life we liv as the most gracious gift that nature, under favorable conditions, has bestowed upon us. J. R. PERRY.

To Our Puzzlers.

Mr. H. E. Juergens very kindly offers as a prize to the first one solving the word square and charade which appears in this number a copy of a book on puzzles, entitled, "Puzzledom in a Nutshell." The answers may be forwarded to my address, and the one who givs the first correct answer will be entitled to the book. The book givs a brief sketch of "the mystic art" from before the Christian era to the present, givs hints on solving puzzles, contains quite a collection of diagrams, a list of the various kinds of puzzles, a list of journals having a puzzle department, and also names and nom de plumes of puzzlers, etc. It is an interesting little work of 72 pages, and is of value to puzzle makers and solvers.

CHARADE.

The other day as I did take
A walk down into town,
I took with me my noble "Jake,"
Of color he was white and brown.
We walked along about two squares,
And met a man, who first did do,
And second right on my noble "Jake,"
Who into a rage quickly flew;
I on the man my whole did set,
Who not a whole rag on him left.

Couldn't Quarrel.

In the depths of a forest there lived two foxes who never had a cross word with each other. One of them said one day in the politest fox language:

"Let's quarrel."

"Very well," said the other, "as you please, dear friend; but how shall we set about it?"

"Oh, it cannot be difficult," said fox number one. "Two-legged people fall out, why not we?"

So they tried all sorts of ways, but it could not be done, because each would giv way. At last number one brought two stones.

"There," said he, "you say they're yours, and I'll say they're mine, and we will quarrel and fight and scratch. Now I'll begin. These stones are mine."

"Very well," answered the other, gently, "you are welcome to them."

"But we shall never quarrel at this rate," cried the other, jumping up and licking his face.

"You old simpleton, don't you know that it takes two to make a quarrel any day?"

Edited by HORACE SEAVER.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted we won't ask you to continue with us any longer

BEES! BEES! BEES!

FROM $2,000 TO $5,000 A YEAR KEEPING HONEY BEES.

The particulars are simply to prevent the great loss that most bee masters have to contend with annually. Then give the bees a chance to increase and collect surplus honey to their fullest capacity; all of which can be easily accomplished by using the kind of hive described in "Kidder's Secrets of Bee-keeping."

Send for the Book and see how easily it can be done with a few swarms of bees.

THIS BOOK IS A RELIABLE GUIDE

to all persons that keep bees, especially to the novice or new beginner, as it teaches how all of the troubles and disappointments that the bee master is liable to, can be successfully overcome, such as Foul Brood, Dysentery, Bee-Robbery, Ravages of Moth Millers, Loss of Queen, loss of bees in Swarming time, by their flight to the forests, also the great loss in winter and early spring management, which is usually more than all other ways combined. This book will also inform the bee master HOW BEES WILL INCREASE AND THROW OFF SWARMS to an enormous extent, all conditions being favorable. The old stocks will frequently swarm three or four times each, and oft times the first swarms thrown off will swarm once or twice each, with a good hive and right kind of management. In warmer climates the bees will increase and swarm to a much greater extent.

GREAT YIELD OF SURPLUS HONEY.

This Book will inform the bee master how to get the greatest amount of surplus honey, and at the same time hav it in small packages weighing three-quarters of a pound to two or three pounds, as may be desired, which will command the highest price in market. In a good season the bee keeper may calculate on two or three hundred pounds of surplus honey from each old stock, and from fifty to one hundred pounds from the earlier young swarms, especially if they do not over-swarm.

NO MORE BEE-STINGS IN MANAGING BEES.

The Book will post the bee-keepers how to manage them when putting them on, or taking off surplus honey boxes, and not get stung in the whole operation.

BEE-KEEPING FOR OUR SONS AND DAUGHTERS.

It being the most pleasant, as well as the most profitable business that young people can engage in, and at the same time remain at home with their parents. The author has known of several young men who commenced the culture of the bee in their teens, and are now making more money than their fathers who run the farm, and doing it easily and with small investments. We must also remember that the women folks often make the best of bee-keepers, and not so liable to neglect them as the men folks.

KIDDER'S BEE BOOK

should be in the hands of all persons who like honey, and take an interest in the little honey bee. It contains more matter than many books that sell for two dollars, and is embellished with numerous cuts and drawings. There is no trouble, loss, or damage that a bee master has to contend with but what the book will give the proper remedy by simply referring to the index, and that will point to the page where it is fully explained.

In order to bring this book more prominently before the mass of bee keepers, the Author proposes to give, as a premium to each purchaser of a book, from this date until July next, the privilege of making his Celebrated Patent Bee Hive, as spoken of in book, for their own use (but not to sell) Free of Charge, otherwise there will be the usual Patent Fee of Five Dollars to each individual that wishes to make and use the hive

PRICE, BOARD BOUND, 75 cents; CLOTH, 85 cents.

N. B. The directions for hive making with cuts, drawings, etc., will be inclosed within each book sold, until July next, (not longer). Now is the time for all bee-keepers to avail themselves of this liberal offer, which is simply to buy a book at the Regular Price, before July next

Some One Has Lied.

BY LAROY SUNDERLAND, D.D.
Ex-revival Minister of the Methodist E. Church.

An old theologic idea!
That inspires us with faith and with wings;
Elliptical. odd, very queer,
When reviewed with the total of things;

A legend, a myth, Jewish story,
Of the first mistake ever made;
A blunder for God's great glory,
And followed as ministers' trade;

A fable from heaven above us,
A burst from the upper clouds;
Sung in churches by Christians who love us,
And believed by the credulous crowds;

A barbarian Bible idea,
As to how God's failures begun;
And of which all the saints, year by year,
Shout glory for work that is done;

A wreck of the race in still water,
Brought about by an ever-wise God,
Was a holy biblical slaughter,
Queer enough, and certainly odd.

Was not that a calamity horrid,
Not by the de'il, but a friend;
And thus was eternal war ordered,
Nor will it hav ever an end.

Of all failures this was the first one
What God's wisdom has failed to expect;
He started his boilers and burst one,
And his plans and his hopes became wrecked.

. . . . . .

Life's voyage began when all its sail were spread,
When this wise God announced with great surprise,
That all his officers and crew had mutinied,
And then turned backward and fled to his skies.

And this all-wise God has remained unknown,
Even to all his priests that go between,
Ensconced so high upon his heavenly throne,
As if ashamed thereafter to be seen.

His plan a failure, this God cried aloud,
His fat was then thrown all into the fire;
When he decended from his cloud,
Of erring Eve and Adam to inquire.

Catastrophes by God were brought about,
As horrible for each one as for you,
Then nature's order should hav been wiped out,
Its very vitals smitten through and through.

From that depravity comes all our pain,
Our sorrows, sicknesses, and grief,
No exit from God's adamantine chain,
Doomed e'er to suffer, and without relief;

The work of living, and of death the fears,
Beyond all any one can know,
A spark of transient joy, with many tears,
Succeeded by an everlasting woe.

And, thus, our race has long been tossed about,
With nondescript like this as guide,
Of him, the race has always been in doubt,
As well they knew, sometime, some one had lied.

And thus it is the mind is first deceived,
By preaching when a wound is made,
And sick by faith, they are by faith relieved,
And thus we hav the priest's and preacher's trade.

No Christian can hav any solid base.
They choose the sky to rest themselvs upon,
And to the clouds they pray for saving grace,
And fail again, as God has always done.

The Christian world united prayer hav made,
And failed, for murdered Garfield when he died,
'Twas thus in faith that all the churches prayed,
And now they know again some one has lied.

The drift of that old book is but a dream,
To judge us human beings by,
And damn us all to fires of hell agleam,
All from a mythus hidden in the sky.

In the beginning thus this Godhead failed,
And still his glory is forevermore proclaimed
Upon his own, the subtil serpent, he has railed,
And hence that reptil, innocent, was blamed.

God swelled with anger on an unborn race,
And still on anger doth he love to feed;
An equal curse is in his saving grace,
When God himself is powerless to succeed.

And all the curses by the human tongue,
Increased ten times ten million million fold;
And all the popish curses launched, and said, or sung,
Fall far below this story herein told.

Ere born we all are blasted and accurst,
To God the glory, now and ever more;
Yet, in this monster still the Christians trust,
And on their bended knees his name adore.

Curses like these the devil in hell would shame,
But not a devil could perform such things;
And on mankind then still put all the blame,
And thus the pulpit preaches, prays, and sings.

Thus of a myth that fills unbounded space,
And shows us how that he himself has lied;
For many that he failed to save by grace,
He tells us in his heart of heart he cried.

In this Godcraft credulity has always sailed;
Its captain has been out of sight so long,
We overlook how he has always failed,
Or else there ever could hav been no wrong.

Hence, that Pandora's box has opened wide,
Whence all this mischief ever known has come,
That no sky-captain any way can hide,
And hence was born to him one bastard son.

And what a birth, and false, too false to tell,
How many of that circumstance hav lied;
And of damnation endless in a burning hell
Lies hav been told and falsehoods multiplied.

And still they say sin has the more increased,
The whole race has been growing worse and worse;
All prayers hav failed, while every saint and priest
Is urging on us now that fearful, hellish curse.

Oh! what a monster knot of holy lies,
Black lies above six thousand years long;
By Christian gulped and swallowed with closed eyes,
And worshiped in this prayer and praise and song.

As to that story of a talking snake,
Humanity still smiles and sneers with scorn;
The race should hav been stopped with that mistake,
And unto Adam no more sons been born.

Hence, here and now, to you I hav explained,
Why good men fail the heinous wrong to see;
In false ideas they hav too long been trained,
Wrecked by a myth upon the open sea.

MORAL.

Our emotions of faith, of hope, and of fears,
Come from trust in a mythical God;
When the mind overshadowed by false ideas,
Fails to cognize the holy fraud.

The isms are blown as soap bubbles are,
That float and are wafted around;
That balloon is inflated with faith as with air,
And, punctured, must fall to the ground.

Quincy, Mass., June 22, N.E. 108.

Col. Kelso's New Book.*

E. C. Walker in Lucifer.

The book before me contains 833 crown octavo pages and is, mechanically, a credit to the enterprising publishing house which issues it. Good paper, excellent type, fine press work, all combine to make it one of the neatest books sent out by Freethought publishers.

Col. Kelso is one of the most slashingly vigorous of the later school of American writers, and in the work now under consideration there is no diminution of mental or physical power. In these twenty lectures he givs the "scriptures" a very severe but not uncalled-for overhauling, and "sends home" another screw in the coffin-lid of superstition. The lecture upon the "Sabbath of the Bible" is especially valuable and should be printed as a separate pamphlet and sold cheaply for distribution among ignorant and bigoted Sabbatarians.

We hope that Col. Kelso will receive his reward for the labor and sacrifices performed in the preparation of this book in the form of extensiv sales, for he certainly has struggled through much that would hav appalled less devoted champions of truth; and then the intrinsic merits of "The Bible Analyzed" should secure for it an extensiv reading.

From the San Francisco Universe.

THE BIBLE ANALYZED is the title of a new work by Col. John R. Kelso, whom we are proud to claim as a Californian. Col. Kelso is the author of two other works which hav attracted the attention of Rationalists and Christians. The volume before us is a book of 821 pages, has a copious index, and is embellished by a portrait of the author, which is decidedly military in its contour. We hav read with care "The Bible Analyzed," and pronounce it to be an honest work. The "sacred volume" is subjected to a severe criticism and from its own pages are given positiv proofs of its fallible origin. We hav always looked upon the Bible as being of human origin, a record of the heroic Jewish race, a truthful picture of the faults and failings of "the chosen people," who are of us and amongst us for all time. If any man thinks that the Bible is aught else let him peruse this work. We hav had occasion to criticise, in a severe manner, the former works of Col. Kelso, but in this, his later effort, there is a seriousness and dignity worthy of a man who tries to dethrone myths consecrated in the hearts of millions. The work is published in fine style and is from the printing press of THE TRUTH SEEKER Publishing Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York City.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.
A TRUTH SEEKER
Around the World.
FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.
With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.
BY D. M. BENNETT,
Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.
Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.
Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a
Freethinker's History of the World.
This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library. Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers he world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

He has for twenty years treated exclusivly all diseases of the Sexual Organs, in which he stands pre-eminent. SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., are cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. NO STOMACH MEDICIN USED. It is one of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. Gems of Thought.

IT is grand to show kindness even to the brute creation, to the animals which are serviceable to us, and minister to our needs and comforts; and then how much grander to be kinder to human beings whose needs are greater and whose sorrows are often more acute than those of animals! Man has already made great progress since he began to rise from the low estate in which he first found himself, but the progress is but slight in proportion to what he is capable of. He has done well, but he is capable of doing still much more.—D. M. Bennett.

THE true hero is the one who does right, regardless of ifs and buts; he aims for truth, justice, and for the highest good to the greatest number. He does not say, "Will this bring me the most good, glory, or honor?" but "Will it be right? Will it be just? Will it result in the best ends for humanity?" This is the position that leads to true heroic martyrdom; to the only sacrifice of self that is just and right.—Elmina D. Slenker.

"VERILY, I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away, till all these things be fulfilled" (Matt. xxiv, 34). See also Mark xiii, 30; Luke xxxi, 32. Also Matt. xvi, 20; and x, 23. If these predictions really proceeded from Jesus, he was entirely in error on the subject, and the prophetic spirit was not in him; for not only did his advent not follow close on the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 71). but eight een hundred years hav since elapsed and neither he nor the preliminary signs which were to announce him hav yet appeared. If these predictions did not proceed from him, then the Evangelist has taken the liberty of putting into the mouth of Christ words and announcements which Christ never uttered.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

IT seems a very hopeless thing, nowadays, to try to hold any minds by the mere bonds of authority. The intellectual air all around is too astir for this. There is no system of mental seclusion that can well shut out the young from experiences the most opposit to those to which they hav been accustomed. The old safeguards which were wont to inclose the religious life as with a sacred chain no longer do so. Even those who rest within the shadow of authority do so in many cases from choice rather than from habit They know not what else to do. They hav gone in quest of truth and hav not found it; and so they hav been glad to throw themselvs into arms which profess an infallible shelter and seek repose there. This is not remedy for doubt, but despair of reason. And no good can come in this way.—Principal Tulloch.

IT is asserted that the doctrin of the immortality of the soul and of happiness in a future state givs us a solution of that distressing problem—the misery of the innocent upon the earth. But in reality it does nothing of the kind. It does not explain the origin of evil and it does not justify the existence of evil. A poor helpless infant is thrust into the world by a higher force; it has done no one any harm, yet it is tortured in the most dreadful manner; it is nourished in vice and crime and disease; it is allowed to suffer a certain time and then it is murdered. It is all very well to say that afterward it was taken to everlasting bliss; but why was it not taken there direct? If a man has a child and beats that child for no reason whatever, is it any palliation of the crime to say that he afterward gave it cake and wine?—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

IT is almost as difficult to make a man unlearn his errors as his knowledge. Mal-information is more hopeless than non-information, for error is always more busy than ignorance. Ignorance is a blank sheet, on which we may write; but error is a scribbled sheet, on which we must first erase what is written. Ignorance is contented to stand still with her back to the truth; but error is more presumptuous and proceeds in the same direction. Ignorance has no light, but errors follow a false light. The consequence is that error, when she retraces her footsteps, has farther to go before she can arrive at the truth than ignorance.—Colton's Lacon.

THE superstitious man considers not that the most genuin method of serving the divinity is by promoting the happiness of his creatures. He still looks out for some more immediate service of the supreme being, in order to allay those terrors with which he is haunted. And any practice recommended to him, which either serves to no purpose in life, or offers the strongest violence to his natural inclinations, that practice he will the more readily embrace, on account of these very circumstances which should make him absolutely reject it. It seems the more purely religious because it proceeds from no mixture of any other motiv or consideration. And if for its sake he sacrifices much of his ease and quiet, his claim of merit appears still to rise upon him in proportion to the zeal and devotion which he discovers. In restoring a loan or paying a debt, his divinity is nowise beholden to him, because these acts of justice are what he was bound to perform, and what many would hav performed, were there no God in the universe. But if he fast a day, or giv himself a sound whipping, this has a direct reference, in his opinion, to the service of God. No other motiv could engage him to such austerities. By these distinguished marks of devotion he has now acquired the divine favor. and may expect, in recompense, protection and safety in this world and eternal happiness in the next.—Hume's Natural History of Religion.

MEN, like butterflies,
Show not their mealy wings but to the summer;
And not a man, for being simply man,
Hath any honor; but honor for those honors
That are without him, as place, riches, and favor,
Prizes of accident oft as merit.
—Shakspere's Troilus and Cressida.

A PETITION FOR STATE SECULARIZATION.

To the Honorable Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress:

A republican form of government being based on liberty, equality, and fraternity, as both means and end, involves the separation of Church and State, whose union is the worst form of class-legislation and the most infallible sign of arbitrary power. A house divided against itself cannot stand. The institutions of this Commonwealth should be made homogeneous throughout. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of truth in whatever direction. Any infringement by government of this absolute equality of its citizens is the parent of manifold evil, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, this government was founded to "establish."

And yet, though the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," there does exist a union of Church and State, which gives to Christianity moral and material aid, and so proscribes other religions and forms of belief and unbelief, while taxing these also for the support of that special religion.

The ways in which this old alliance between Church and State still survives among us are:

1. Recognition of God and Christianity in State Constitutions.
2. Exemption of Church property from taxation.
3. Appropriations of public money for sectarian purposes.
4. Religious exercises, as the reading of the Bible, etc., in the public schools.
5. Laws enforcing the observance of the Sabbath on the authority of the Bible.
6. Religious test-oaths in courts of justice and on instalment into office.
7. Chaplaincies in the Legislature, the Army, and the Navy.
8. Fast and Thanksgiving Proclamations, which contain theological ideas that may or may not be acceptable to the citizen.

The necessity for this separation of Church and State is more apparent now than ever before, because of the still greater diversity of religious beliefs, the many forms of dissent from the religion which receives State patronage, and the growing signs of sectarian strife and ambition in the arena of politics. And emphasis needs to be given to the fact that the union of Church and State is a great hindrance to the employment of right methods in dealing with many questions of reform now demanding attention. And most essential is it at all times, and especially in the present, in order to secure for the law its due respect and observance, that the people's representatives should exhibit the strictest fidelity to their trusts by following the law in its letter and spirit.

Your petitioners, therefore, pray that immediate action be taken by the law-making power to bring into harmony the theory and practice of our government in making the following principle a part of the fundamental law of the land by amendment to the United States Constitution:

The total separation of Church and State, by prohibiting Congress or any State, County, Municipality, or Township from enacting any law that favors religion in any of the eight ways specified, or in any other way, or prohibits the free exercise thereof.

Odds and Ends.

NO, my son, do not laugh at a young woman because she cannot throw a stone with accuracy; when you shall hav married her, you may find that her awkwardness in propelling missils is her chief charm.

"LET me see," thoughtfully said a man who was looking at an old well, "the windlass needs repairs, the bucket leaks, the rope is rotten, and the curbing is defectiv, but considered as a hole, I think it will do."

AN Oswego paper describes a fire by saying that "the red flames danced in the heavens, and flung their fiery arms like a black funeral pall, until Sam Jones got on the roof and doused them out with a pail of water."

A YOUNG man sent fifty cents to a New York advertiser to learn "How to make money fast," and was advised in reply to glue a $5 greenback to the bottom of his trunk. Having neither greenback nor trunk, he is still unable to make money "fast."

"MAMMA," said a little girl, "do all the wicked go to the bad place?" "Yes, dear," "And all the good people go to heaven?" "Yes." "Ain't some people wickeder than other people?" "Yes, I suppose they are." "Well, I think that the people who are not so very wicked ought to go to the bad place only in the winter time."

"YOU are beginning to grow old," said the raspberry to the strawberry, as they peeped over the edge of the new style half-pint quart boxes at each other; "but I must say you giv indications of being pretty well preserved." "Oh, you be jammed," said the strawberry, and then, as the grocer carried one of the boxes off, the conversation was discon-continued.

AT a meeting of the Austin Literary Club, not long since, during the discussion the president spoke of printing having been invented during the fifteenth century, whereupon one of the graduating class of the University of Texas, who happened to be present, laughed derisivly, and said. "That's all bosh, I've got a 'Life of Christ' in my room, and he lived more than three thousand years ago."

SAYS Oscar Wilde: "My marriage is intended to realize a poetical conception I long hav entertained." That is pretty good for Oscar, but it will certainly take time for him to fully understand whether his "poetical conception" will be fully realized. It would hav been better for Oscar to hav kept his mouth shut for the present anyway, then nobody would hav known of his ambition in case it proved a failure. Oscar's wife will probably object to "clubs," etc., just the same as ordinary wives do.—Peck's Sun.

"AH, my dear friend," said the clergyman, "you should not feel that way, but rise above your enemies." "Rise above 'em is it?" retorted the angry man, "Rise above 'em? I will do that very thing if I ever get him near enough to me so that I can knock him down and walk on him!" The clergyman considers it a hard case to adjust, and has given it up for a bad job, but he keeps watch of the murder column of his local paper, to see if the man has really made the effort to rise above his enemy.

THERE is more theology and logic on tap in the brain of the small boy than in that of the dignified D.D., and it isn't every man who wears a seven and a quarter hat that gets the best of him. "The lions didn't like Daniel, did they?" asked "Shavey Head," of his well-posted papa. "Oh, yes, they did. The Lord made the lions like him, so they wouldn't hurt him." "Well, when God makes me like anything I eat it, I do." "Yes, yes. Go away, child. He made the lions hate Daniel." "Then why didn't they bite him?"

WHILE Rome was yet burning, and Lucullus Pennarum, the editor of The Daily Quiritan, was employing every means to catch the early mails, Titus Quibblerius, the musical critic, arrived in hot haste. "What news from the fire?" eagerly inquired the enterprising Roman journalist; "hav the Diocletian baths succumbed to the devouring flames?" "Of that I hav no information," replied Titus Quibblerius, the musical critic; "but I hav here a two-column criticism of the violin fantasie performed to-night by our most august emperor, Nero. I find that in the seventh andante passage of the third symphony he slurred the descending fourth note of the D in alt, allowing the instrumentation of the contrapuntal adagio to staccato with a vibrato quality into an inordinate pianissimo fiorituri."—Chicago News.

ADVICE.

What'er you hav to say, my friend,
Whether witty, or grave, or gay,
Condense as much as ever you can,
And say in the readiest way;
And whether you speak of rural affairs,
Or particular things in town,
Just a word of friendly advice—
Boil your MS. down.

For, if you go spluttering over a page
When a couple of lines will do,
Your butter is spread so much, you see,
That the bread shows plainly through,
So, that when you hav a story to tell,
And would like a little renown,
To make quite sure of your wish, my friend,
Boil your MS. down.

DRESSED for church, she stood before the mirror admiring herself, and mentally observed that she never had appeared more lovely. The candid critic, however, would hav declared that her figure was not in just proportion, for she was very tall and thin, and her hight seemed greater than it actually was, in consequence of a bunch of ostrich plumes that floated in snowy masses over her hat. "Yes, I know I am handsome," she said; "but I can't help it;" and, turning to go out, caught sight of her little brother standing in the doorway. "What are you doing there, Bob?" she asked sharply. "Looking at you, Fanny?" returned the artless child. "What do you want to be staring at me for?" "'Cause you look just like a long-handled feather duster." And sitting all alone in church that morning she wondered how she would feel if Bob got the measles and died.

Notes and Clippings.

A GIRL pupil in the drawing class of an Omaha convent school was punished for banging the hair of St. Cecilia.

LOUISIANA seems determined on the suppression of the press, having passed a law imposing a license fee of five dollars on every newspaper man.

IN the Philadelphia directory the name of "Carrie Kilgore, lawyer," is given in large letters, and underneath it the name of "Damon Y. Kilgore," her husband, in small type.

THE Rev. R. Hodgson, an English vicar, who has taken the lecture field, reconciles science and religion by arguing that pre-Adamite remains are nothing more nor less than fossil angels.

"YOU had better make haste with your breakfast, deacon," said his wife, "or we'll be late to church. Don't you want a cup of coffee?" "No, I guess not," the good old deacon replied. "Coffee keeps me awake."

A COLORED lawyer of Baltimore sets forth in a petition to the Senate that he has acquired a thorough legal training; and yet laws of Maryland exclude him from practicing his profession in that state solely on account of his color.

"UNLESS this nation returns to the ways of the pilgrim fathers who mixed their prayers with their labors and duties," said the Rev. James Chambers last Sunday, "the republic will not last." Another conversion to the God-in-the-Constitution party!

MR. BRADLAUGH and Mrs. Besant state, in response to Mr. Green's invitation to be present at the Convention of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, that it will be impossible for either of them to cross the Atlantic this summer. Charles Watts, however, will be on hand.

A YOUNG gentleman while calling on his girl asked for her hand and heart and was accepted. He told her that he had had something on his mind for a long time, but was afraid she would get mad. Says he: "I hav two brothers in the penitentiary." "That's nothing," replied she; "I hav two brothers in a theological seminary."

THE clerical triumph in Belgium is already bearing its natural fruit. The building of schools has been stopped. Now, as of old, the clergy object to the eating of the fruit of the tree of knowledge. Their gains are threatened by the education of the people, and between the church and the school no peace is possible.

FOR the terrible crime of lying on the grass in City Hall Park, a New York police justice has sentenced two colored men to prison for ten days each. To prevent further deeds of this dreadful note the New York police and courts are so busy that they hav no time to look after the little misdemeanors of peculating bank presidents and unfaithful cashiers.

THERE was quite a ripple of excitement, says the Toronto Mail, in the Division Court before Judge McDougal on the 3d. W. N. Sears, of No. 139 Church street, was the defendant in an action on an account. He entered the witness box to giv evidence, but refused to be sworn. He said he was not a Christian, and an oath would not be binding upon him. His honor sent for a copy of the statutes, and found that he had power to allow the witness to affirm, which was done.

IT appears that the Prohibitionists who, in the interests of religion and morality, hav nominated for the presidency that Christian statesman, ex-Senator Pomeroy, better known as "Old Subsidy Pom," are only a part of the Prohibition party. The Pomeroy Prohibitionists desire to prohibit secret societies, and a quantity of other things, as well as the sale of spirits. The majority of the Prohibitionists think, on the contrary, that it is better to prohibit one thing at a time, and they intend to hav a convention of their own, and to nominate their own candidate. Anything more ridiculous than the nomination of Pomeroy by any class of reformers could not well be imagined. To mention only one fact, Pomeroy, at the time when he was driven out of public life for bribery and corruption, was a leading member of a prominent secret society. This savory person is now put forward as the special representativ of morality, religion, and opposition to secret societies.—Times.

MULLER'S ORPHANAGE, at Bristol, England, is protected by prayer, and not by sanitary arrangements. There is, in consequence, an actual outbreak of typhoid fever, seventy cases and four deaths; and this is the third attack this year. In the debate with David King fourteen years ago, Mr. Bradlaugh drew attention to a similar state of things in the same Orphanage, then noticed in the daily press, and in 1880 Henry Varley, on the authority of Muller's agent, charged him with falsehood.

CARNIVOROUS plants that lie in wait for, and entrap unsuspecting insects, hav long been known. Now Prof. Baird sounds a warning against a voracious fish-eating plant. The queer feature of the story is that this bladdervort has hitherto been carefully introduced into the government's carp ponds as food for the fish, nobody surmising that it makes the fish its own food. The carp might well complain of misplaced confidence against their protectors. An old poet notes that plants "are, with constant drinking, fresh and fair;" but it is evident that some of them also eat fish.

IN his Sunday morning prayer, a Wisconsin minister prayed the Lord that such of his congregation as were speculating in wheat might be brought to a realizing sense of their iniquity by losing heavily. During the next week wheat dropped nine cents per bushel, and twenty-three members of the congregation had such cold feet that they couldn't stand still. The week after that there was a meeting of the congregation to see about raising the minister's salary, and the result of the meeting was to cut it down from $1,500 per annum to $800. As one of the kickers answered in explanation: "We had them Milwaukee chaps right by the short hair, and this fellow had to jump in and request the Lord to knock us endways. If he wants more'n $800 a year let him buy lottery tickets and pray for 'em to hit."

THE funeral of Mrs. Elizabeth A. Hatch, the wife of Mr. A. L. Hatch, of Astoria, L. I., occurred on July 2d. Her only daughter, a beautiful girl of about nineteen years, died in 1877, and, in the belief of the parents and of many others, her spirit appeared frequently in their house and went about the different rooms as in the days of her life. So firmly were Mr. and Mrs. Hatch convinced that they thus enjoyed the presence of their dead child that their grief over her death was greatly relieved. Up to the time of Mrs. Hatch's last illness, her parents hav not for a moment doubted that she was frequently and visibly with them, and Mr. Hatch is still firm in that conviction. Mrs. Hatch died June 30th, and the services were prior to the removal of the remains to Vermont, where they will be interred. A large number of friends were present. On an easel at the head of the casket was a large, life-like portrait of the deceased daughter, and below it a smaller engraving of her as she is reported to hav frequently appeared bending in misty outline over her mother as the latter sat at a piano. In addition to the services of music and prayer, there was an address by Mrs. Nellie Brigham, the Spiritualist lecturer.

CHURCH "lawn parties" hav been very fashionable in Norwich, Conn. Two or three hundred church-members, ladies and gentlemen, in summer attire, gather on the lawn of a fellow-member, play tennis and croquet, and eat ice-cream under the trees. The latest party was unfortunate in furnishing a practical test of the efficacy of prayer. The First Baptist Society worships in a large fashionable Gothic church under the maples on the west side. They are one of the most influential denominations in the city. The most elaborate lawn party of the season was appointed for a recent Wednesday afternoon on the spacious grounds of John H. Ford, one of the members. It was important that the weather should be auspicious, and on the Sunday preceding the pastor, the Rev. Mr. Dickinson, and all the congregation, joined in a fervent special petition at the morning and evening sessions that the heavens might wear an unclouded face on the appointed day. There was no reason to apprehend rain. None had fallen for nearly a month. The sky was like steel and vaporless, the earth baked with the drouth. On Wednesday afternoon, just as the party were gathering, a thunder-cloud rolled over the sky and a deluge of water fell all the afternoon and until the middle of next day. It was the heaviest rain in several years, over five inches of water falling. The members of the First Baptist Society are at a loss to account for the phenomenon. Outsiders think that the prayer gauge must be out of order.

LONDONDERRY, Ireland, is greatly excited over an affair which has cropped out from the Orange-National feuds. During vespers in one of the Catholic churches a man wild with excitement entered the church door and yelled at the top of his strong voice, "Look out, you damned Papists!" Then he ran down the center aisle, howling and cursing as he went. He reached the sanctuary rail, and with a bound he passed over the rail and ran up the steps to the altar. This he attacked, and succeeded in breaking to fragments the benediction pieces standing outside the tabernacle. He then leaped upon the altar table and cursed the people and priest. Disrobing himself of his coat, vest, and pantaloons, he danced upon the altar, and then snatched up the communion cloth and tore it to pieces with his teeth. Finally the officiating priest and a number of men rushed upon the intruder. He was hurled from the altar, and would hav been torn limb from limb but for the interference of the priest. The man made a desperate resistance, and was not overcome until some policemen handcuffed him. He had taken such a firm hold with his teeth upon the communion cloth that it had to be cut away from his mouth. It was ascertained that he was an Orangeman of weak mind who had become hopelessly demented during the recent exciting political events in Derry. He was removed to an asylum.

AMONG the other vicious and "dangerous doctrins" which the pope says the wicked Freemasons promulgate, are the following: "That men hav all the same rights, and are perfectly equal in condition; that every man is naturally independent; that no one has a right to command others; that it is a tyranny to keep men subject to any other authority than that which emanates from themselvs. Hence the people are sovereign; those who rule hav no authority but by the commission and concession of the people, so that they can be deposed, willing or unwilling, according to the wishes of the people. The origin of all rights and civil duties is in the people or in the state, which is ruled according to the new principles of liberty. The state must be godless; no reason why one religion ought to be preferred to another; all to be held in the same esteem." Well, now, all that may be very "dangerous" and "incendiary" over in Europe, but it sounds all right over here. We believe this United States government is founded on these very Masonic principles. If that is all the pope has to say against the "free and accepted Masons," then we, an impartial outsider, neither a pope nor a Mason, shout: "Long liv the goat!" and back him against the bull to win every time. Back him head first at that, too, that's the way a goat backs most effectivly. And by the way, in Ireland, which we believe is a Catholic country, and outside of Ireland certain Irishman, whom we believe to be Catholics, are bravely fighting with their mouths, and laying down their lives, in their minds, for these very same principles of liberty, equality, and the reign of the common people. The horns of the goat appear to be exalted.—Hawkeye.

MR. P. RYAN, of Long Island City, N. Y., has not been able to vindicate the right to play ball Sunday on his private grounds, and last Sunday the players were stopped by the police.

THE cholera at Toulon and Marseilles, France, is thought to hav reached its maximum. The inhabitants of those cities are leaving their homes by the hundreds to escape the disease.

THE survivors of the Seventeenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers hav erected a monument at Gettysburgh, Pa., to the memory of their comrades who fell in battle at that place on July 3, 1863.

MISS MULLER, who is a member of the London school board, a woman suffragist, and a property-holder, refused to pay taxes on her house until she should be allowed to vote. She was sold out by the sheriff.

MISS LULU HURST, the so-called "magnetic girl" of Georgia, is in New York. According to those who hav witnessed her exhibitions, the feats of strength which she performs may be accounted for by an enormous muscular development.

A TORNADO swept through the southern part of Sioux City, Iowa, on the evening of the 4th, wrecking a bell-tower, two churches, and several other buildings. In Macon, Sangamon, and Christian counties, Illinois, on the 5th, buildings were blown away, and crops destroyed by a cyclone.

JOHN L. SULLIVAN, the pugilist, was too drunk to spar with Mitchell at the match arranged to take place in the Madison Square Garden in this city last week, and many thousand people were thereby disappointed. Mr. Gibbs, the temperance advocate, immediately sent Sullivan a pledge with the request that he sign it.

MUSIC was furnished in Central Park last Sunday, and the largest crowd ever seen in the park gathered to hear it. This is the first Sunday music given at that place. In Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, fifty thousand people enjoyed themselvs. The fourth Sunday band concert on Boston Common was listened to by large crowds.

THE American lacrosse team has returned from England after repeated victorious contests with British athletes. They report that they were rather shabbily treated by the Britishers. Myers, the American champion runner, is winning easy victories over the pedestrians of London. Lawn tennis and cricket teams from this country are also meeting with success in England.

THE Fourth passed over New York without doing the city any serious damage. There was rain in the afternoon, and noise all day. Firecrackers that made a report as loud as a young cannon were frequently exploded. Nervous people suffered. It required the exercise of great patriotism to repress the wish that the Americans of Revolutionary times had been everlastingly licked.

CHRISTIANITY AND SECULARISM.

On the evening of Tuesday, June 10th, in Mr. Long's quaint-looking Mission Hall, Saltmarket, Glasgow, there was reserved for all true lovers of controversy one of the most enjoyable of intellectual treats. Under the presidency of Mr. James Allan, of the Glasgow Eclectic Society, a public discussion of some repute in the history of dialectics took place between Mr. Harry Alfred Long, the accredited Calvinistic champion of local orthodoxy, and Mr. Charles Watts, the well-known Secular leader and Freethought advocate from London. Mr. Watts, it will be observed, has been, during the short interval allotted him from his journalistic duties in London, activly engaged in Freethought propagandist work beyond the Tweed, delivering a regular course of lectures on the principles of Secularism, and the fallacies and delusions of the popular creed, and had on the previous evening, as pre-arranged (or predestinated), fought a well-contested battle with Mr. Long, in the Secular Hall, Ingram street, on which occasion the latter assumed the defensiv. Implementing the articles of agreement, it was Mr. Watts's turn to combat the orthodox champion on the Christian platform, confronted with an audience chiefly composed of Mr. Long's most spirited retainers, and a fair representation of advanced thinkers from our local branch, with of course the usual following of conventional nondescript Christians.

At eight o'clock precisely the stately figure of the secular champion, accompanied by the chairman, was observed passing through the hall on the way to the dialectic stage. This, it need hardly be said, was the signal for loud and prolonged cheering from all parts of the hall, which was densely crowded. The reception accorded Mr. Watts on this as on all other occasions, was a most enthusiastic one—the harbinger of beneficial results in the future. This is highly gratifying to the noble cause he advocates, as it contains in it the germs of an intellectual emancipation of the people, inciting them to a studious course of impartial investigation and honest inquiry.

The few introductory remarks of the chairman past, it was Mr. Long's duty to take the initiativ by attacking "Secularism Entirely Wanting in Authority," the subject selected for the ensuing two hours' discussion. Generalizing the matter of the first speech, which lasted half an hour, the fatalistic Hercules contended that Secularism philosophically considered was baseless, unauthoritativ, and without leader, human or divine; that the followers of this uninviting, earth-born philosophy were the children of wild caprice, and without a goal when the cold, blank mantle of death descended upon them. Frail barks, destitute of chart and compass, they were mercilessly tossed about in the tempestuous waters of that illimitable ocean of Agnosticism, Mare desperationis tenebrosum.

The following may be accepted as a fair specimen of his reasoning on this particular point: "Suppose we form a meeting under the presidency of a gentleman elected for the evening, we pass certain rules; can we make them into laws? We can for ourselvs, but not for the community. The people outside would take no notice, any more than they do of those of Good Templars, Freemasons, Foresters, or other friendly societies. They make rules, not laws." Leaving aside reiteration, inconsistencies unpardonable, and the inharmonious use of incidental inferences, it would be foreign to the purpose of the present article were we to recall to memory Mr. Long's exhaustless repertoire of stock arguments; suffice it to say that a great deal of the matter introduced into the first and subsequent speeches was of a nature irrelevant and extraneous to the subject matter under discussion. This is admittedly one of Mr. Long's prominent argumentativ qualities, and one which he has acquired, need it be said, after a lengthy apprenticeship extending over twenty years and more. A young and inexperienced opponent, animated with honesty of purpose, though not inured to the wily tactics of dialectic warfare, as practiced on the Christian platform, would not attempt the cunning and evasiv artifices of the Sautmarket predestinarian, but would boldly attack the debatable points, bravely perishing in the heroic but futil attempt. Mr. Long has at last realized in its fulness the truth underlying the grand old secular maxim, that life, with all its drawbacks, vicissitudes, and future prospects of an endless existence in the devil's crematorium, is really worth living, and when he "runs away" from the subject matter under discussion, he evidently intends to "fight another day," either with Mr. Watts or his worthy colleague, commencing where he left off, and ending where he commenced, which was somewhere in the neighborhood of the Feejee Islands or Timbuctoo, for, alas! such is the controversial life of a Christian dialectician.

Mr. Watts on rising to reply to the indoctrinal points raised by his opponent was most courteously received. And as the brilliant oratorical powers of this distinguished secularist are well known to all readers of secular literature on both sides of the wide Atlantic, it would be serving no end or purpose were they to be again dilated upon in the present pages. His arguments, as might hav been anticipated, were crushing and conclusiv. All the points of his adversary were closely scrutinized and the fallacies exposed. Though Mr. Watts did not deprecate the secular and utilitarian teachings of the book divine, the pillar and ground-work of Protestant faith, yet he declared it to be a book of human origin, which, with all its lofty sentiments and sublime teachings, inspiring men to deeds noble and good, it also contained much that was pernicious and impracticable in this enlightened age, and on which account it was highly detrimental. Referring to a future life, he said the present life is a reality, and that all our ideas regarding a future or transitional state of existence were chimerical, vague, and undetermined, a mere speculation begotten of selfishness and cherished by the illiterate and ungovernable multitude. The best preparation, he averred, for the acceptance of a future state of existence, assuming the possibility of such, was a life well spent in the present state—"Virtue hath its own reward."

At ten o'clock the discussion was brought to a termination, nothing untoward having happened to mar the enjoyment of the evening, and the disagreeable services of the chairman, as he anticipated at the outset, were never, during the evening, called into requisition.

About three years ago, when the same gentlemen confronted each other in hostil attitude, it will be remembered that a great number of the "convinciv arguments" adduced by Mr. Long were only brought forward to be rebutted by the very effectiv replies of the secular champion. The same were again resuscitated from the dead, amongst which may be mentioned the ameliorativ effects of Christianity in the Feejee Islands, which Mr. Watts at once attributed to the intellectuality of the human race, the introduction of the public press, and the benign influences of an advanced civilization accruing therefrom.

Christian charity at home and abroad was another theme on which he frequently descanted. Mr. Watts had to again point out the fact that hospitals, and other similar institutions for the alleviation of human suffering, had been in existence in many of the highly civilized states of the ancient world at periods long anterior to the advent of Christ, leaving out of the question the systematized, ethereal code known as modernized Christianity. Mr. Long evidently forgot to mention the Mitchell Library, the Buchanan Institution, and many other unsectarian educational institutions in close proximity to the classic Saltmarket of Glasgow, that were the gifts of secularists, who do not look for their individual reward in the skies, but considered the moral and intellectual well-being of the race of primary importance.

BANDERILLERO.

Our London Letter.

The latest clerical dodge for getting money is somewhat ingenious if true, and as it has been reported in more than one of the daily papers, and has met with no contradiction, there is no reason to doubt its correctness. At South Kensington, a piano-organ is being taken around the streets, and worked by a footman in livery, contributions being collected by a clergyman, whose name, however, is not given, and who solicits donations, which he receives on a silver salver. His ostensible object is to procure funds for the relief of the outcast poor in his district, but anyone with but a slight knowledge of the ways of the clergy may easily imagin how the money is bestowed, and what is its ultimate destination. The report of an inquest held at Croydon, near London, may perhaps throw some little light on the matter. A poor woman died there a week or so back, and, according to the evidence given, she was receiving the munificent sum of 3s. 6d. (about 85 cents) per week from the parish authorities, half of which she had to pay for her lodging, the other portion being considered sufficient to find her in food. She was too ill to work and increase her means in any way. It appeared in the course of the inquiry that she received visits from "Christian" district visitors, but that they never gave her either food or money, but considered that they had sufficiently done their duty toward her by reading tracts and ministering to her spiritual welfare to the neglect of her physical wants.

This is perhaps a fair specimen of the "immense amount of good" done by "self-denying Christian helpers" of both sexes who instead of wasting their precious time in the frivolities of the word, devote their lives to the glory of God, and the assistance of the poor and needy. Christianity of the present day must indeed hav a hardening effect upon the hearts of its adherents. No one but a modern Christian could go into the wretched abodes of the victims of civilization, and see the suffering caused by insufficient food and foul air, and calmly read them a tract, or a chapter from the Bible, instead of at once relieving the bodily distress so apparent. For bread they giv them a stone, and the coldest, hardest stone they can find, and then complain that the poor are so ungrateful, and don't receive their visits in a proper spirit. Were they not so weakened, and their spirits so broken by their hard struggle for the bare means of subsistence, they would, I should think, kick such visitors from their doors, and in many cases such treatment would be only too well merited.

Year by year appeals are made to the public for funds to support these missions, and the immense amounts collected and squandered by officialdom, and wasted in the publication of the utterest trash that ever emanated from the mind of man, would go far to relieve the helpless poor amongst us.

Atheists are often taunted because they do not possess hospitals, and so-called charitable societies; and it should be one of our proudest boasts that we don't require them, for the Atheist has more of the milk of human kindness in his bosom than the pietist, and relieves want before he sees the wretched object dying of starvation, and past all help.

I am quite willing to admit that there are many Christians better than their creed, and many Atheists worse than theirs; but as Christianity is supposed to hav such a humanizing effect upon those who believe in it, and Atheism such a demoralizing effect upon all who accept it, surely there ought to be such a vast difference apparent between the two that its effect shall be apparent in every act of their lives. Every believer should be superlativly good, and every unbeliever superlativly bad. The believer should always wear a beautiful expression on his countenance, and a halo of glory round his head, while the unbeliever should show to the most casual observer by his gloomy and forlorn appearance that the blackness of despair was continually gnawing at his heart, and that he was perpetually enduring the pangs of a bitter foretaste of the eternal fires to which he was doomed before ever the foundations of the earth were laid.

Al Koran.—The Other Book of Divine Revelations.

The best authorities in statistics giv the following round figures as the numbers of the followers of the different creeds on this globe:

Buddhists and Brahmans,	740,000,000, or 51.53	per cent.
Christians and Jews,	400,000,000, or 27.86	" "
Mohammedans,	180,000,000, or 12.53	" "
Heathens,	116,000,000, or 8.08	" "
Total,	1,436,000,000, or 100	per cent.

Thus it appears that while the Bible is the book of revelation—this means the book of divine communication—to about one-fourth of all human beings, the Koran is the book of revelation, of divine communication, to about one-eighth of mankind; or, for two Bible readers—if all Christians and Jews were Bible readers—there is one Koran reader on the face of the earth. It would thus appear that although American Freethinkers hav bestowed prevalent attention on the Bible on account of their immediate surroundings, the Koran deserves a share also of their interest and of their investigation.

While in younger years a student at one of the justly renowned polytechnical institutions of Central Europe, and an enthusiastic Christian, I came into friendly intercourse with a young Constantinopolitan, sent to the same institution by his wealthy parents. As would be natural for a Christian trained to missionary instincts, on one of our promenades I turned our conversation to religion and creeds. As all Christians do, I felt eager to bestow on my friend the benefits of Christianity, and began to speak about the holy book, the Bible. My Mohammedan friend patiently listened to me for a good while, and when I paused he asked, "So, now! hav you said all you wanted to say?" And when, with the customary reservation of good Christians, I answered, "Yes, for the present," he drew out of his pocket, to my great astonishment—no, not a dagger or a pistol, as Christian imagination would be apt to hav it—no, not that, but a Bible; and then he proceeded as follows: "I knew it would come, you Christians are such meddling people, so I prepared for it. Now, if I prove to your own admission that your Bible lies right on its first page, will you cease bothering me with it, and permit our conversation in future to exclusivly be concerned in matters more worthy of our attention?" I willingly conceded, because I expected to be able to explain the history of creation in the Bible to be typical of what geognosy had taught us of the origin of natural things. My Mohammedan friend opened his pocket Bible at its first page, and therefrom read: "And God made two great lights, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: he made the stars also." And then vehemently closing the lid of the holy book, he proceeded, "What did he make, if anything, but one light and one reflector, and not two lights?"

Being both of us students in exact sciences, it would not do for me then to attempt covering up the biblical misstatement by theological interpretation.

We never spoke thereafter about religion again; but I afterwards learned the young Turk had become a citizen of the great republic of Freethinkers and Agnostics, which, during the last quarter of the nineteenth century, is extending its realm at a higher rate of conquest than Christianism or Mohammedanism did in the early stages of their history.

RELATION BETWEEN BIBLE AND KORAN AS STATED BY THE KORAN ITSELF.

Chapter v of the Koran, entitled "The Table," or, also, "Contract," contains amongst others the following, the "we" used meaning divinity speaking through Archangel Gabriel:

"God formerly accepted the covenant of the children of Israel; and we appointed out of them twelve leaders; and God said, Verily I am with you; if you observe prayer and giv alms, and believe in my apostles, and assist them, and lend unto God on good usury, I will surely expiate your evil deeds from you, and I will lead you into gardens wherein rivers flow; but he among you who disbelieveth after this, erreth from the straight path. Wherefore, because they hav broken their covenant we hav cursed them, and hardened their hearts; they dislocate the words of the Pentateuch from their places, and hav forgotten part of what they were admonished, and thou wilt not cease to discover deceitful practices among them, except a few of them. But forgiv them and pardon them, for God loveth the beneficent. And from those who say, We are Christians, we hav received their covenants, but they hav forgotten part of what they were admonished; wherefore we hav raised up enmity and hatred among them till the day of resurrection; and God will then surely declare unto them what they hav been doing. O ye who hav received the scriptures, now is our apostle come unto you, to make manifest unto you many things which ye conceal in the scriptures; and to pass over many things. Now is light, and a perspicuous book of revelations come unto you from God. Thereby will God direct him who shall follow his good pleasure into the paths of peace; and shall lead them out of darkness into light by his will, and shall direct them in the right way. They are Infidels who say, Verily God is Christ the son of Mary."

THE ORIGIN OF AL KORAN DESCRIBED IN ALMOST THE VERY WORDS OF CHRISTIAN HISTORIANS.*

The religion of the Arabs before Mohammed, which they now call "the state of ignorance," was idolatry in its Sabian version, but there were also great numbers of Christians, Jews, and Magians among the Arabs. The Sabians revered a supreme being, but paid adoration to the stars, or to the spirits of the stars, also. Their creed took shape in many and severe ritualistic exercises, and in the offering of sacrifices, but different from the Jews. They ate not thereof, but burnt them all. Prohibition included beans, garlic, and some other pulse and vegetables. Their "Kebla," or the place to which to turn when praying, appears to hav been the favorit star of the devotee. Their pilgrimages were directed for unknown causes to a place, "Harran," in Mesopotamia, and to the Egyptian pyramids, believed to be the sepulchers of Seth and his two sons, Enoch and Sabi, the latter being considered as the father of their sect. Of the Bible they acknowledged the book of Psalms exclusivly, but they had other sacred books, amongst others one written in the Chaldean idiom called the book of Seth, discoursing on topics of morals. Christianity had never affected them further, but that they had accepted John the Baptist as a prophet, and by alliteration to Sabi they called themselvs in consequence Saba, this is "the host of heaven." The Koran later on called them "the people of the book."

It sounds strange when George Sale, in his book, "The Koran Translated," on page 16 of his preliminary discourse, states: "Some of the pagan Arabs believed neither a creation past, nor a resurrection to come, attributing the origin of things to nature, and their dissolution to age." These words were written before Darwin had ever published a line, and the author was not aware how subtle theology made a distinction between the nature of matter, and the supernatural existence of metaphysical individuality. Sage at many places proves his adherence to the high church of England, and thus had no cause to color in the premises. The sciences the Arabians chiefly cultivated before Mohammed rose were three: 1. History and genealogy of their tribes; 2. The knowledge of the apparent movements of the stars and of their influence on the weather; 3. The interpretation of dreams.

If such was the state of religious affairs in Arabia, the Arabians were not entirely without knowledge of what was going on in the so-called Christian world. Even when relying on ecclesiastical historians exclusivly, Christianity must hav had some peculiar effects on the nations which had adopted it. Let me quote from Risant's "State of the Ottoman Empire," p. 187, where he states as to these nations that they were "far from being endowed with activ graces, zeal, and devotion, and established within itself with purity of doctrin, union, and firm profession of the faith." On the contrary, what by the ambition of the clergy, and what by drawing the abstrusest niceties into controversy, and dividing and subdividing about them into endless schisms and contentions, they had so destroyed peace, love, and charity from among them, and instead thereof, continually provoked each other to that malice, rancor, and every evil work.† The worship of saints and images in particular was then arrived at such a scandalous pitch that it even surpassed whatever is now practiced among Romanists.*

Thus Mohammed found idolatry amongst his own nation, and corruption amongst other nations, as an instigation to reform. To aid him in such reform, he found among his own countrymen their three great virtues, eloquence, expertness in the use of arms and in horsemanship, and hospitality.

F. M. F. C.

*Much in this chapter is taken almost verbally from George Sale: "The Koran," London, F. Warne & Co., as well as from Boullainsvillier's "La vie de Mohamed;" "State of the Ottoman Empire," and Prideaux: "Life of Mohammed."

†From Prideaux's preface to his "Life of Mohammed."

*From Boullainvilliers' "La vie de Mohammed." But it should here be said that when Boullainvilliers wrote these lines, he knew not of what the second half of this century would produce in the way of pilgrimages of noble France to Lourdes (an apparition of Mary in a tree), Italy to Rimim (a picture of Mary moving eyes), Belgium to Verviers (image of St. Mary with a black face), and Germany to Kaevelaer and Telgte (doll-images of St. Mary), or he would hav known that Rome was still going from bad to worse. It will not be long before we shall hav on this continent, also, a miraculous image of St. Mary, as the object of adoration for Catholic pilgrims. It is bound to come.

Mr. Perry—Mr. Rothwell.

I had concluded, on account of the abundance of good matter always on hand for the paper, I would not trouble you for a while by writing on any subject; but just as I was sweetly reposing in my obliviousness and indifference to the mental world, I get a nudging from P. Rothwell, of Vineland, who points out some of my errors in regard to what constitutes Materialism, and wants to know what Materialist says that "that which perceives and knows of material forms (the mind) is nothing?" In answer, I will inform him that the gentleman I was criticising, Mr. Putnam, says so. In his "Problems of the Universe" he has gone into an elaborate definition of the subject of mind, and uses a number of illustrativ terms to convey the idea that mind is nothing but action, and that action is the result of the changes in matter. When matter does not act, there is no action and consequently no mind. And this is the general thought held by Materialists. Again he inquires, "Are the senses that perceive, and the brain which knows, not things?" It seems that the gentleman makes no distinction between sensations and perceptions, and the organs by which they are conveyed to the mind. Every one admits that the brain is a something; but the perceptions of the mind must pertain to that realm of thought which many say is not a substance. If Mr. Rothwell will be kind enough to explain the difference between an idea of thought and a barn door, or the brain that generates it, I shall feel under obligations. By all means make an effort to expose all Perry's errors. That is what is wanted—more light.

I think the friend has misunderstood me, or he would not ask the questions he does. I hav not said that when nature produces a perfect physical form, the fact of death shows it to hav been a failure, or that a Darwin or Shakspere was it a failure. What I do say is this: The mind which inhabits a physical body is the better. The thought that moves the form is better and higher than the form, no matter how beautiful it may be. At death this beautiful body decays, but not an atom goes to waste; every part and parcel of it is economically re-utilized and made to adorn some other part of animated nature; but that better part, that mental engin, force, power, mind, is lost to itself, diffused and annihilated—lost, say the Materialists. Now what I say is that to save every atom of the defunct body, and destroy the most important thing that pertained to it, is a failure, and argues that nature is only engaged in the everlasting work of producing physical forms that are perishable at most; while if that spirit were to draw out of this decaying form its most vital product, and continue to liv on and progress, it would argue a profitable result instead of the contemptible failure which an elaborate process to produce nothing as a final result involves. If Shakspere and Darwin are a success to us and posterity, it does not argue that they are a success to themselvs; and here is where the difference comes in this question. Is a man a success to himself? Does consciousness pertain to a refined materiality?

I do not believe that friend Rothwell has studied all the facts of nature, and I doubt his authority for saying as he does, "that the body and mind decay together, and at death there is no more thought, as thought is but nervous motion." If he could prove these assertions, the whole question would be settled; but if he proves this instead of taking it for granted, it will giv him something of an undertaking instead of mere assumption. How does he know that consciousness, having evolved from or by any other means associated with the most advanced organic forms, will, at death, cease to be so associated in the future? What facts has he to prove it? Does matter send out thought, or does thought act on matter? Can a man build an engin, or does the matter compel the man to form it? If the mind is merely action, or nervous action, then the real actor must be his body, while we know that a human being is a duality, having a conscious being that acts on the body, and is, in turn, acted upon by the wants of the body. A man may be intensely hungry, but for a purpose he may refuse to gratify that hunger; he may hav planned a fast, or he may want to starve himself. The world is full of facts to show that the mind is a power greater than its body, and usually controls it within certain limits, and the more mentality the man possesses, the greater will his control be over the passions of the body.

The pursuits of the astronomer, mathematician, philosopher, and inventor, in using his mind to discover things not directly in reference to his bodily wants, shows a mental world of thought in which the physical body is subordinated to the higher wants of the mind. The body influences the mind only to remind it of its own wants, and does it mainly through the involuntary nerves, but is a mere servant to the higher reason, and usually does its bidding. The body and mind are not one thing, but two things, intimately connected and related, but still distinct things. If this is not so, it ought to be shown to the contrary. Respectfully, J. R. PERRY.

Vivisection of Human Beings by the Hundreds of Thousands.

A WORD TO ELLIOTT PRESTON.

I hav just finished reading the article of Elliott Preston in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 21st. In it I find these words:

"Now, then, is the proper time to educate the children and the masses in regard to this matter, so that they will not only demand that that now practiced be discontinued (for the sake of humanity and true progress), but that it may become impossible to spread the evil under the sanction of the law. Licensing vivisection appears only to make the matter much worse; such, at least, has been the case in Great Britain, where an act granting licenses was passed some eight or nine years ago. It serves only to protect the vivisectors instead of the animals. Hence, my readers, never favor the licensing of vivisection, for it is only a cloak for concealing the crimes of science; insist upon absolute, unconditional prohibition or it, or things will be made worse, not better."

A great principle was never enunciated in better terms than Mr. Praston has employed in the above quotation. The crimes he calls upon all right-minded and sympathetic people to join him in making impossible are deserving of the severe condemnation he so bravely pours out upon them. He has my sympathy and my "good-speed" in his noble endeavors.

Bad as it is to permit a class of peaple to legally use dogs, cats, and asses with cruelty that by some fortunate accident such persons may discover something that will hand their names down to posterity as great discoverers, it is still worse to license—that is, enable to act under the protection of the law—a large class of people to vivisect hundreds of thousands of human beings, the fathers, brothers, sons, and even mothers, sisters, and daughters of society. Does this sort of thing go on in civilized and Christian lands? It certainly does. What is the object of these human vivisectors? To liv without labor. Do they succeed in living upon the humanity they vivisect without laboring themselvs? They do. "Tell us the manner of it. I may as well be hanged as tell the manner of it."

However, let me call attention to another passage in Mr. Preston's able paper:

"4. The Medical Times and Gazette flippantly mentions an experiment on a living dog, which consisted in forcing half a pint of boiling water into the stomach, 'in order to show that the animal tissue could be disorganized; and that the animal, after giving evidence of great suffering, vomited blood and died.'"

The license which the law givs in nearly all Christian lands is to do to human beings a more atrocious thing than pouring a pint of boiling water into the stomach; it is to pour into the stomach a quart or so of alcohol. Such a quiet and comparativly easy death as vomiting blood and dying does not follow this extensiv vivisection of humanity. The human being thus vivisected with alcohol dies the horrid death which follows an attack of delirium tremens. No beast ever suffered anything more terrible. Nothing is more certain than, as Mr. Preston has explained, license only makes the matter worse, giving the color and sanction of the law to the abominable practice. I am for prohibition on this very principle. Judge Pitman, the same who quashed the indictment against Mr. Heywood, will probably be nominated by the Prohibition party for the vice-presidency before this little communication to the ever onward and upward TRUTH SEEKER can be published. Would it not be wise for the Liberals to struggle for the prohibition of every wrong? LIBERTA.

Illinois State League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I should like to hear from the Liberals of Illinois, and especially from the members of the State Liberal League, in regard to what their wishes may be in reference to holding the annual State Liberal Convention, this year. If it is their wish to hav the convention it will be necessary for them to express their willingness to contribute something toward the necessary expenses. I am no longer able to bear the bulk of the burden lone. Address me at 302 State street, Chicago, Ill. Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

F. F. FOLLET,
Sec. State L. L. of Ill.

Communications.

Mr. Walker Coming Around.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In your reply to Seward Mitchell you say, "As Mr. Walker's position is to load the League with a large number of side issues having no connection with or relevancy to its charter objects, we imagin the impregnability is a debatable manner." Will you be so kind as to name even one of this "large number" of side "issues" with which I am trying to "load the League?" You certainly cannot refer to the Milwaukee platform, for in your editorial to which Mr. Mitchell referred in his criticism of you there was no attempt made to connect me therewith, your strictures of me following your review of that, and being upon an entirely different matter. As a matter of fact, I opposed the adoption of most of those resolutions, and hav since given them a lengthy and unfavorable review in Lucifer It is true that I voted for the anti-prohibition plank. It was before the congress by no act of mine, but it expressed my sentiments, and I gave it my vote. But I am not at all anxious to make that question a part of the League work. All this, however, it is not particularly necessary to dwell upon for the reason that there was nothing in the article of mine in Lucifer which you criticised which referred in any way to the Milwaukee platform. Where, then, are your "large number of side issues?" Purely and solely in your imagination, my dear sir. Re-read my "Reforming the Lines," and your criticism of it, and you shall find that the only point of serious disagreement between us was in regard to the propriety of the League demanding the repeal of all obscenity statutes, so-called. You agreed with me that it was not the time to cease the agitation for the repeal of the Comstock (national) statutes. You showed that such agitation was in no way extraneous to the original objects of the League, and in taking this view of the subject you uttered sentiments which I hav entertained and expressed ever since the discussion of this matter was sprung upon us by the seceding faction. Where are the "side issues?" I again ask.

You demand the repeal of the national obscenity statutes; I demand the repeal of all such statutes. Behold what a great smoke a little fire kindleth! Out of this one divergence of opinion hav come (in the mind of Mr. Macdonald) a "large number of side issues," etc., with which I am trying to "load the League."

Admitting, for the sake of argument, what I deny as a matter of fact, that to demand the repeal of state "obscenity" statutes would be a side issue, and we find that your "large number" is reduced to one! And yet your whole reply to Mr. Mitchell rests upon this fundamental misstatement of my position. But is the demand which I would hav the League make really a side issue? In a word, hav we even one side issue left as a basis for your assertion? I aver that it is in no sense a side issue, that it is part and parcel of the demand which you yourself favor. You say that you are in favor of the "repeal of any" law which attempts to limit freedom of opinion. Does not a state law do this as much as a national one? Hav you not attempted to make a distinction where there is no real difference? Injustice is injustice whether committed by a state or a national court. The League stands upon insecure ground, and in an indefensible position, so long as it does not make this fight as a matter of principle, and demand the "repeal of all law limiting freedom of choice in the realm of letters and of art."

In conclusion, your "large number of side issues" resolves itself into a difference of opinion between you and me regarding the dangerousness and criminality of state as compared with national "obscenity" statutes. Will you not frankly say so, as becomes a man who desires to deal justly with his fellows?

E. C. Walker.

The National Liberal League.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I am much gratified to observe the spirit of reconciliation that seems to be abroad in the Freethought ranks, and to notice the seemingly honest effort from various quarters to reorganize the National Liberal League at its next congress on a basis that will be acceptable to all parties. And as I notice a number of nominations hav already been made through your columns for the new officers, allow me to nominate a board of directors that, in my opinion, would unite all the friends of state secularization:

For President, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

For Secretary, Samuel P. Putnam.

For Treasurer, Courtlandt Palmer.

For Chairman National Executiv Committee, B F. Underwood.

Chairman Finance Committee, Mrs. Judge Mattie Krekel.

I am sure if the election is unanimously tendered to Col. Ingersoll by all sections of the Freethought party on a platform such as is now proposed, he will accept it, and his name would be a tower of strength for the new monument. Then let the national committee be made up of such well-known, earnest Liberals as T. B. Wakeman, of New York; F. E. Abbot, of Massachusetts; J. H. Burnham, of Michigan; G. W. Baldwin, of Pennsylvania; G. H. Walser, of Missouri; John C. Bundy, of Chicago; E. C. Walker, of Iowa; W. H. Burr, of Washington; Byron Adonis, of California; Dr. H. Lamb, of Maine; Joseph Gillson, of Ohio; Dr. J. R. Monroe of Indiana, and others from the states and territories not named of equal influence and ability; and then, forgetting all past differences, all go to work in earnest for the sole object of state secularization, and I am sure that the great reform that was so nobly inaugurated by Mr. Abbot, and those who met with him at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, will go forward to victory in the near future. Many of us hav despaired of ever seeing such a union of the friends of Freethought, but this is a day of sudden and remarkable occurrences, and it looks now as if such a desirable state of things might be brought about. If so, we will giv our old friend, A. B. Bradford, the credit of first suggesting it, and too much praise cannot be given Messrs. Wakeman and Leland for the magnanimous course they hav taken in this matter.

You make the suggestion in your editorial article this week, that the National Liberal League Congress meet at Cassadaga Lake at the same time that the New York State Freethinkers' Convention meets there. I hav just written to the board of directors of these grounds and hav got their permission to hav the Liberal League hold its Congress there the 8th and 9th days of September, the two days following our convention, and I take the liberty, through your columns, to invite the board of directors of the National Liberal League to hold their coming Congress at the time and place here named. By so doing we will bring together the largest assembly of Freethinkers that was ever convened on this continent. Now I hav had my say, I hope everybody will be free to speak their own sentiments. Let us all unite and work for liberty and humanity. H. L. Green.

Mr. Putnam's Nomination Seconded.

From the Pittsburgh Truth.

The Truth Seeker of May 31st nominates for president of the National Liberal League Samuel P. Putnam, of New York. We know of no Freethinker better qualified for the position than Mr. Putnam, and if elected believe he will perform the duties of that office with an ability and dignity equal to that of Mr. Wakeman. If it is not too late we will second the nomination. We regret that Messrs. Wakeman and Leland desire to resign the offices they hav so acceptably filled.

Col. Ingersoll in Cleveland.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll lectured here a few evenings since to one of the largest and most intellectual audiences ever assembled in this city. It was the finest audience I ever had the pleasure of looking upon in this or any other city.

A prominent Liberal of this city has this to say about the event in the Sun, the leading Sunday journal of this city:

INGERSOLL AND HIS AUDIENCES.

To the Editor of the Sun: The immense audience assembled in Case Hall on Friday evening to listen to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll's lecture on "Orthodoxy" (and his audiences in other cities are about the same) must certainly set the clergy to thinking, if it does not totally refute the statement made some time since by one of the ministers of this city (Rev. T. F. Hildreth), who said:

"The devotees of Ingersoll you will find in the rum-shops, in the brothels, and in all the dens of infamy throughout the land. You will find that they are those who under the guise of honesty overthrow public morality and decency."

A grosser slander was never uttered. For a more respectable audience, ranging in age from seventeen to seventy, never graced Case Hall, and it is worthy of mention as a noticeable fact that so many young folks were present.

Will the Rev. T. F. Hildreth dare to include such an audience in his category of devotees?

The failure of one of our great dailies to report a discourse which attracted so many of our best citizens, while so much of its space is daily given to "baseball," "horse-racing," "wrestling," and "slugging matches," etc., etc., shows either an ignorance of the growing skepticism toward "Orthodoxy," or a perverse and wilful endeavor to mislead the people and bolster up orthodoxy.

The paper referred to as refusing to notice the colonel's lecture is one of the most intolerant journals toward the Catholics that I hav ever read. As a contemporary has expressed it, "the editor is afraid of the pope's toe."

The lecture was practically the same as delivered in other cities, and was delivered in the author's own impressiv and instructiv style.

Our society (the League) is steadily gaining in membership, and is, I believe, a thing that has come to stay.

It is very much to our regret that there was no place in the city that would accommodate a larger audience than the hall procured for Col. Ingersoll (the largest in the city), for many were turned away from the ticket office, being refused even the privilege of standing room, so large was the attendance. Every seat in the hall was reserved and sold before the evening of the lecture, besides many tickets for standing room. I think that if the Liberals of our city would only stir themselvs a little and make an effort, the many Liberals throughout the country would aid us in building a hall that would accommodate a large audience in this city, that would be controled by Liberals, and would be open for any Liberal speaker. Why should it not be so? It is true that our city is very bigoted, but still we hav a fine band of willing but unable patriots who would erect a temple to Freethought if they were able. With a little liberal aid we could erect a fine building similar to the one in Boston, owned and controled in the same manner, and the stockholders would also realize a fair dividend from their investment. Who will speak first? W. I. Irvine.

Christian Persecution.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In a recent number of The Truth Seeker I see a letter from a very dear friend of mine, to whom I had sent a copy of my new book, "The Bible Analyzed," and whose opinion of said book I wished given to the public. From the letter in question I learn that my friend's opinion—a favorable one—was given to The Truth Seeker for publication. From the same letter I learn further that the publication of this opinion was stopped by my friend, who, as she expresses it, was "on the rack of persecution," and who feared that the publication of an opinion favorable to my book would add to the bitterness of that persecution.

In regard to this matter you well remark, "What a beautiful state of society that letter shows to exist in that town, and what a blessing Christianity is to the people of this country!" What a beautiful state of society, indeed! And yet the Christians of that town are no more intolerant than are their brethren of all other towns and cities in which they are largely in the majority. Indeed, though many weak-kneed Christians now try to deny the fact, Christianity is essentially an intolerant religion, and the whole history of the Christian church establishes this fact beyond all dispute.

The fact that persecution does not now prevail to so horrible an extent as it prevailed during former ages is due entirely to the decline of Christianity, and not to its greater power. Without fear of successful contradiction, I assert that the Christian church never abandoned any form of persecution, no matter how horrible that form might be, so long as she r. tained the power to use it. With equal fearlessness, I assert that she has never admitted that her persecutions of the past were wrong; that she has never renounced her pretended right to persecute; and that she has never disclaimed her intention to renew those persecutions, should she ever recover her lost power. I further assert, and defy successful contradiction, that the religious toleration which does now, to some extent, prevail in several countries, has been brought about, in spite of the church, by Liberalism, her natural enemy. Christians, then, must hav a monstrous amount of "cheek" to arrogate to themselvs, as they do, the credit of this better condition which, as they well know, has been brought about, in spite of their utmost endeavors, by their enemies, the Liberals.

Even Jesus, the reputed founder of Christianity—if the teachings of the New Testament be any authority—was himself an embodiment of bigotry and intolerance. "And whosoever shall not receive you nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house, or city, shake off the dust of your feet. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah, in the day of judgment, than for that city" (Matt. x, 14, 15).

"Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household" (Matt. x, 34, 35, 36).

"And found in the temple those that sold oxen, and sheep, and doves, and the changers of money sitting: And when he had made a scourge of small cords, he (by assaulting them in a ruffianly manner, and being sustained by a mob of ruffians) drove them all out of the temple, and the sheep, and the oxen; and poured out the changers' money, and overthrew the tables" (John ii, 14, 15). The parenthesis is mine. The parties here driven out by Jesus and his mob, had just as good a right in the temple as had he, and they were engaged in a much more honorable business than that of assaulting peaceable people with unlawful weapons, overturning tables, etc., and committing other acts of inexcusable rowdyism.

"If any man come unto me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 26). This is, undeniably pure Christianity; and it is also, undeniably, the religion of pure hate. So is the following: " . . . he that believeth not, shall be damned" (Mark xvi, 16). Could the followers of such a teacher be otherwise than bigots and persecutors? See how quickly and how naturally Paul follows in this same strain: "If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye hav received, let him be accursed" (Gal. i, 9).

These are all undeniably Christian teachings of the very highest authority, and they undeniably require all true Christians to hate and to accurse or devote to destruction all unbelievers, and all heretical believers. And this is just what all true Christians hav ever done. They hav never recognized unbelievers and heretics as possessing any rights, except the right to be burnt at the stake, and then damned to eternal burnings after death. He that does not hold these views is tinctured with unbelief or heresy, and cannot justly claim to be a true Christian.

Let us, then, not blame Christians for being persecutors, since they cannot be the former without being the latter. Let us labor for the overthrow of the system of religion which makes persecutors of otherwise good men and women. While Christianity exists, persecution will also exist.

The friend whose persecutions called out this article is a delicate little woman—a widow who is dependent for her own livelihood, and for the support and the education of her children, upon her earnings as a teacher in the public schools. She is a woman whose intelligence and refinement render her an ornament to society, and whose goodness renders her a blessing. And yet Christians are now standing between her and her means of earning a support, and are threatening to take those means away if she dares to publicly express her favorable views of Liberalism in general, or of my new book in particular. I regret exceedingly that I hav innocently added anything to the burden of her persecutions. As the matter stands, however, I will ask, as a personal favor, that every reader of this article will place it in the hands of some Christian friend, and let him see what his religion really is, and what it is doing. I hope that every Liberal, who feels able to do so, will also place the book in question in the hands of a Christian friend, and let him see whether, for indorsing such a book, a worthy widow and her children should be deprived of their means of living. Please order this book at once.

For nearly thirty years, I hav been almost constantly exposed to these same forms of persecutions. Being a disabled Union soldier, I, like my fair little friend, am now dependent for a livelihood principally upon my earnings as a teacher in the public schools. And if the indorsing of such a book as "The Bible Analyzed" calls forth so bitter persecutions against her, how much more does the writing of the book call forth persecutions against myself. How long I shall be able to hold my position in the public schools I do not know. If every Liberal who is able to do so would buy one or more of my books, I would not need to teach any more at all, and would giv my whole time to the noble cause of Liberalism.

Modesto, Cal., June 28, 284. JOHN R. KELSO.

Notes from Dr. J. L. York in the Lecture-field of Montana.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please find inclosed nine dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER, to be used as directed in private letter.

That our friends who are interested in the movement and cause of mental liberty in the far West may know where I am and how goes the battle, I send, as before, my notes from the lecture-field.

My first appointment on the trip found me at Eureka, Nevada, where I gave six lectures to splendid audiences, I trust with good results.

The orthodox religion is quite faded and thin among these sons of toil who delve in mother earth for the precious metals. And a gospel Sunday is out of the question in the mines; in fact, the sound of pick and shovel and the roar of the smelting furnaces goes on night and day, year in and year out. A mining town in the mountains is an unhealthy place for religion—too busy to think how Christ died, but not too busy to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and turn out to a radical Freethought lecture.

Thanks are due at Eureka to Geo. Gavin, C. B. Bidwell, and Jason Burlingame for the comforts of home and kindness during my stay.

The next place was Salt Lake, where my story was brief, as I found on arrival that the celebrated Gerald Massey was already advertised to open a course of lectures on the following day. I, however, spent the day in calling on some of the friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER in Salt Lake. I made a hurried visit at Farmington on the way to Ogden in order to shake hands with Henry Souther and Hector Haight, two warm supporters of our noble cause in its struggle against the Mormon deviltry.

Taking the northern line, I passed through Utah and into Montana, over a wide stretch of country, beautiful in its wildness and rich in mineral wealth and stock-raising, reaching Butte City right side up with care.

This is a most thriving camp of about ten thousand people, and without doubt the richest on the Pacific coast since the days of the Virginia bonanzas. The people here were hungry for the gospel of nature, and responded by full houses for six nights. Many thanks are due here to W. W. Filkins, Dr. Whitford, and others, and especially to our friend Fred Cook, one of nature's noblemen, for much kindness in helping us to do our work in Butte City. With the promis to return in two or three weeks for another course of lectures, I turned toward Bozeman, a fine little town of about fifteen hundred people on the North Pacific Railroad, where I am advertised to giv a course of four lectures, and where I am at the present writing.

There is a large Liberal element in this little city. I hav had the pleasure of meeting Dr. Stover, a stanch Infidel, who writes sometimes for THE TRUTH SEEKER; also Thomas Burk, former president of the Liberal League here. I am also made happy in meeting our old-time friend, Mrs. Judge Davis (formerly Belle Chamberlain), who in former years canvassed the entire Pacific coast in the interest of Liberalism. Her many friends will be glad to know that she is pleasantly situated in Bozeman, surrounded with every comfort. And well she deserves comfort and rest after her long struggle against poverty and religious prejudices, against which she battled for many years.

Next week I will be in Helena, and the week following in Butte City again, after which I am going to giv a short course in Deer Lodge, and thence move on to Missoula, and thence to Spokane Falls, Cheeney, Walla Walla, and so on down the Columbia to Portland, Oregon.

I hav thus sketched the route that readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER may be on the lookout and help me, that I may help them, in the name of universal mental liberty.

With many kind regards for you and yours, I am, as ever, Yours for the whole truth,

DR. J. L. YORK.

The American Party.

Not long ago a convention of the American party was held in Farwell Hall, Chicago. I try to keep slightly posted on political matters, but I was so densely ignorant that I did not even know that we had an American party in this country. Butler should hav been nominated. He is the champion nominee in the wide world, and the other places so far as heard from. I learned by the papers that an American party not only exists, but it has a "mission." During Senator Pomeroy's address on "The Mission" he said, "The adopted citizen should hav all the rights of the nativ born." He advised the committee to make this a "conspicuous plank." It would hav been instructiv to the convention and the people generally if the senator had pointed out and explained a dozen or two of the rights that are enjoyed by the nativ born but denied to the adopted citizen of this country. If he referred to the clause in the Constitution relating to the presidency, his "conspicuous plank" was decidedly un-American. Such is the consistency of party-makers. He advised the committee to be concise and pithy in the statement of their principles. The statement was pithy. Pith is a soft, spongy substance. Below are a few sections of the platform, "which was fervently pronounced to be 'God's platform' by Dr. Blanchard."

The first thought that occurred to me when I read that was, If it is God's platform, why not send it to heaven and hav it read before the gods and angels? We hav no use for it here. Most of the inhabitants of this country are human beings, and would not know how to commence a campaign on a "God's platform:"

"We hold: 1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian scriptures is the author of civil government, and is accepted as our supreme ruler." The first sentence implies that the country is discussing the question whether this is a Christian or a heathen nation, and that it is necessarily one or the other. The fact is, there may come a time when it will be neither. The word "heathen" may be made to cover almost any meaning you please. It has undergone so many changes of meaning and been so differently construed that it is worthless as applied to a nation. With each Christian it nearly means everybody who does not belong to our branch of orthodoxy. Where did the God of the Christian scripture originate civil government? How many books has he written on that subject? Did he ever say anything about a republic or an American party? God may be accepted as our supreme ruler, but who are meant by "our?" The handful in Farwell Hall or all the people of this country? If the former, they are welcome to their ruler, but if the latter, the statement is untrue.

2. "That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions." Supposing the Bible to be perfectly true and the best book on earth, why should it be associated with books of science and literature? Our educational institutions are not supported for the purpose of teaching or studying the Bible. Is it not sufficient that the Christians hav the privilege of studying the Bible in their churches and their homes? Students who wish to become learned in science and literature hav no time for studying the Bible while at school or college.

3. "That God requires and man needs a sabbath." That plank is so explicit that an Infidel might stand on it. Nothing is said about a cessation of business or going to church, or singing, hymns, or anything of that kind. The man who sawed out that plank must hav been one of the party who prepared the timber for Noah's ark. Sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 relate to prohibition, secret lodges, prison labor, and patents.

8. "We hold to and will vote for woman's suffrage." That is a very "short hold" indeed. I fail to see how they can "hold to" something that doesn't exist, and if it were a reality there would be no need of voting for it.

Section 9 demands civil equality for the Indians and Chinese American party on "God's platform." 10 and 11 relate to arbitration and monopolies.

12. "That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency." 13 relates to tariff and taxes.

14. "That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law." Clear as mud! Could anything be more definit? The American party on God's platform has solved the polygamy question. Inasmuch as Congress has made some heroic efforts to suppress polygamy by law, but without flattering success, it would hav been really refreshing if the new party had given us a page or two of explanations of the modus operandi in this little suppression operation. Through some inadvertence a few sections that should hav been appended to the platform were omitted. They are as follows:

15. That every Infidel and Spiritualist should be compelled to attend some Christian church at least three times every Sabbath, and kiss some minister's toe once each month.

16. That the property of any Freethinker should be confiscated and given to any Christian neighbor who may happen to be in need.

17. That the sum of $9,000,000 should be drawn from the United States treasury and expended in Bibles, and that every Infidel should be compelled to buy at least ten Bibles.

18. That every child attending the public schools should be taught that the earth is flat and has four corners.

19. That the government should furnish each of the founders of this party with an ample suit of clothes having an ample supply of ample pockets to hold the ample currency, and each should hav an office with an ample salary attached.

20. Inasmuch as our party will need recruits, the government should appoint an ample exploring committee (from the persons here present) to search the earth—and the stars, if necessary—for a race of men without brains.

And this party went seriously through the mockery of nominating candidates for president and vice-president of the United States, appointing a national committee, and a special committee to notify the nominees of the honor they had received. It reminded me of a group of six-year-olds playing "keeping house," or "school." It is humiliating to one's national pride to think that, in the year 1884, in this favored land, a band of professedly intelligent persons can be found, capable of giving utterance to such pitiful imbecility, such inexcusable idiocy, as the above so-called platform.

Were it not for my strong faith in progression, I should sometimes be tempted to think that man has already passed the culminating point in intellectual development and is lapsing toward barbarism again. Liberals, wake up! Don't doze off to sleep as long as that Bible is allowed inside of an American school building. Get that Bible out, then take a little nap and be ready for the next move. N. G. W.

THE following bit of controversy between the Independent and the Central Presbyterian is funny. The omniscience of the editors seems to be equal to that of God himself, but an unconverted layman can only wonder how they both found out so accurately what is God's intention toward the sinner. We quote from the Independent:

"'The position of the Independent is that a man is not under condemnation for the sin of Adam, but only passes under condemnation when he himself begins personally to sin. This, the Independent admits, he will certainly do, just as the pointer dog will inevitably hav the instincts which belong to that breed of dogs.'

"That is very nearly a correct statement of the facts as we see them. It proceeds:

"'If this is a true account of the case, then of all creatures we are certainly the most miserable.'

"We hav not noticed such to be the case, except as all sin is most miserable.

"'We "inherit," without any fault of our own, a propensity to sin.'

"[True.]

"'Which we cannot resist, which no man has ever resisted.'

"[Which we can resist, which we ought to resist, which millions of saints hav resisted with great success, though none with such entire success as to hav avoided all sin from the beginning of their moral life.]

"'And we are under God's wrath and condemnation for a nature which we cannot help having any more than a pointer dog can help his instincts to act in a particular way.'

"Never, never! God condemns no man for what he does not do himself; no man for what he inherits; no man for the 'nature' which came to him without his will.

"'"God is angry with the wicked every day;" but why is he angry with men for committing sins which they cannot help any more than a dog can help barking or biting?'

"He certainly is not. He would be no God if he were. The whole point of the mystery is that man inherits from his ancestors a nature which is his misfortune, not his guilt. He must resist it, or suffer God's just displeasure."

That settles it.

Whatever Is, Is.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: You may, perhaps, remember that heretofore I hav contributed a few articles for The Truth Seeker, under the heading, "Is Mind Material?" in which I argued only one side of the question of the existence of mind, as well as of everything else that exists in the universe, to show that if Materialism was true, as held by Materialists, that mind and all other phenomena in nature were the result of material organization, then evolution would be chargeable with everything that Materialists find fault with, including every system of idolatry—all the different gods that men hav imagined had an existence and hav worshiped; and every ism and fraud that has ever existed—the Jew-god and Christianity, and every humbug, from the year 1 (if there ever could hav been a year 1) down to the present time; for if the material organization of matter is the cause of all things, then all things are the result of that cause; and according to that theory, whatever is, not only is, but whatever is is right, or, if wrong, would be attributable to that cause for its existence; for there could be no other cause. Having thus summed up my arguments, and answered some of my critics, I proposed, at some future time, if I had time and was so disposed, to present some arguments in favor of a spiritual or eternal intelligence theory; and as I see the subject still elicits continued discussion by S. P. Andrews, S. P. Putnam, J. R. Perry, Otto Wettstein, and others, under the headings of "Universology," "The Problem of the Universe," "Final Causes," "Spiritualism," etc., I hav been induced to present a few thoughts of my own on the subject under discussion, and convictions that I hav entertained for several years; and thought that, for the sake of a little variety, and to avoid monotony, I would take a new text. And, first, to begin a new departure from my former train of thought, I will take up the question presented by Otto Wettstein in his reply to Mrs. Heddon, in The Truth Seeker of Nov. 24, 1883, page 746, where he says: "If you say God created, we say who created God?" and in an editorial reply to Wm. Kirby, in The Truth Seeker of Nov. 17, 1883, page 726, where the question is stated to be, first, "Is there a god," and second, "If there is, did he hav anything to do with preparing the different Bibles now existing?" and again, in an editorial reply to John S. Parish and S. E. Cooley, in The Truth Seeker of Feb. 16, 1884, page 105, where eternal is described, and very truly, as being endless both ways, and has always existed, never could hav been begun, and as every effect must hav a cause, the conundrum is presented, If God is an effect, what or who is the cause of God? and then asks: "Giv it up, do you?" and then says, "Well, here is the answer: There is no such being as is described in the Bible and called God." As to the God described in the Bible I shall not differ from the editor, but as to the idea that there is no God, I shall beg leave to dissent from that view of the question.

To ask the question, Who made God, or what or who was the cause of God? is just dodging or begging the very question at issue, and just as positivly denying the existence of God, as to say so in plain words, and assert that there is no God. For if God could be created, he would not be God. A created being would not be eternal in existence. God must be eternal to be God, as Mr. Editor says eternal means endless both ways, and could never hav been begun. And so must God be; could never hav had a beginning, and can never cease to exist. And as I stated in one of my former articles on the Materialism of mind, I do not believe that God can commit suicide. I believe that to be one thing that God, infinit in power, cannot do. And so God cannot be an effect of a cause. There must be one cause without a cause—eternal. That alone is God. But the Materialist asks how can that be that is inconceivable, therefore impossible! That theory givs nothing to stand upon—that it is necessary to hav a material basis—something tangible, something conceivable. Then I would ask how could matter be eternal? The same question will apply to the material. It is just as inconceivable how this material universe could hav eternally existed, as that an intelligent supreme being could hav eternally existed. It is entirely useless for us to begin where we are and trace back the succession of effects and causes in nature to find the beginning, for there can be no beginning. Something must be eternal, or no thing could be. The fact that I exist is the proof that there is an eternal existence. And, reasoning from the principles by which we are governed in all the transactions of this life, and in compliance with which we learn all we know or ever can know, we must arrive at the conclusion that the eternal cause is an intelligent cause; for we know as surely as we know that we exist, that in all the transactions of this life on this earth, everything is the result of the exercise of the intellectual powers of the mind of man or the inferior animals; that mind is the power, though invisible, propelling and governing all the multifarious business operations, scientific investigations, discoveries in the laws and forces of nature, in the astronomical, geological, chemical, and in every department of science; and everywhere mind is all and all. The activ, intelligent force that plans, supervises, and through these material organisms of ours, which the mind uses for the carrying out its designs, executes those plans and purposes. We can see in all these operations going on all around us the evidence of intelligent design for the accomplishment of a purpose. This, if we would only stop to think how it is so, presents as great a mystery for us to solve as the eternal existence of God. We cannot explain how the mind makes this body move at its will and do its bidding any more than we can explain how God could hav eternally existed. Now if we can see the same evidence of intelligent design in all the works of nature as far as we can scan the universe, then we hav the same reason to believe in an intelligent power that controls the operations of nature, and directs everything with a design for the accomplishment of a purpose, that we hav for knowing, as we do, that mind is the intelligent power that plans and controls all the operations of mankind in the transactions of this life.

Mr. Putnam tells us, on the page of The Truth Seeker referred to (742), that mind is not a substance, that it is simply phenomena, a manifestation. We cannot make it identical with pure existence, for it has no independent life. We cannot conceive of it as existing in itself, while we can so conceive of matter. I think that I can conceive of my own mind as an identical existence, independent of this body, and that I can conceive of it or recognize it in no other way but as an identity, as my ego, myself, though I cannot see it as I see material objects. Yet I can see it with my mind's eye, as is sometimes said—in other words, the mind can recognize itself. I can recognize my own thoughts, and I can recall them from away back in the years past, and reconsider them, and pass judgment upon them as to their value and their influence upon my actions and the formation and development of my character and present condition in life. Will the Materialist tell me that this power, this facility, is all the result of a peculiar material organization, and then tell me in the next breath that these materials are constantly changing under a process of evolution, so that in the course of about seven years every particle of my present organism will be changed, and be composed of entirely different particles of matter from those of which it is now composed; and if this is true, then how is it that the mind does not change? How is it that these entirely new and different materials get possession of and hold on to the old thoughts? Why doesn't the organism of the mind change with the body? I know that I am the same; I am that I was when I was as far back as I can remember—not more than five years old. I think these facts prove that we can make the mind identical with pure existence, and that we can conceive of it as existing in itself as certainly as we can of matter. In fact, we can conceive of it in no other way but as an identical, pure existence. We can conceive of no possible connection between the mind and the material organization of this body. We can not explain how they are connected—how the mind controls the body. All we know is that it can and does—that the mind is the power, the body the machine.

But if it could be proved that mind is the result of material organization, instead of being the result of the direct fiat of the Almighty, it would make no difference as to the result, only as to the mode of producing that result. Whatever is, is; the how and the why are questions open for discussion. If the mind is the result of material organization, then that is God's way of producing that result, that is all. I believe in evolution, but an evolution with a God to back it up.

As to design, Mr. Putnam tells us, as all Materialists do, that "science sweeps the endless heavens with its telescopic glance. It continually discover matter, but not mind. There is no evidence of what we call intelligence." No wonder that mind cannot be discovered in that way, for the discoverer is looking for a material mind, and there is no such thing to find. Might as well look for the end of eternity. But when the assertion is made that there is no evidence of what we call intelligence, I beg leave to dissent, and must deny the truth of that assertion. He says there is "simply orderly force, but orderly force is not mind. It is law, and the existence of law does not indicate mind. Law is not a thing, it is a mode, and this mode always has been, always will be," etc. This is assertion with a little truth mixed in to make the assertion pass, if it will, for truth, like bogus coin, with a little of the genuin coin mixed in. Orderly force is not mind—it is law; but orderly force is the best possible evidence we can hav of intelligent design. Law is for a purpose. It orders a course of procedure, to carry out a design, to accomplish a purpose. It is just as much an evidence of intelligent design as the Victoria Bridge over the St. Lawrence River, which shows the design of making a passage-way for locomotiv engins and trains of cars over that stream of water, which would be utterly impossible without that bridge. And so with all the laws of nature. They are God's rule of action, that is all. They all speak for themselvs. They are for a purpose, to direct us in the right way to the truth, and if we violate any of them we must and surely will suffer the consequences, suffer the penalty that follows every violation of any law. Mr. Putnam says the movement of the stars, the wondrous magnificence of their procession, does not indicate anterior mentality. If law began to be, I grant that the supposition of a mind to begin it would be reasonable. But as law never began, mind as a cause is superfluous, and therefore in the eyes of science there is no such thing. If the movement of the stars and the stability and order of the universe, the regularity and precision of the movements of the planets if they had a beginning, do not indicate anterior mentality, then I do not know what can do it.

If the eyes of science cannot see the evidence of a mind in the laws of nature—whether they ever begun or are eternal could make no difference—then those must be blind eyes, or the eyes of a false science.

If the whole spirit of science is toward unity, and seeks to resolve every force into one force—and this is the goal of all analysis—goes from the complex to the simple, and the more simplicity it finds the more satisfaction it finds, and never will explain the universe by two things, but eventually by one, then all science has got to do is to accept the theory of one supreme, self-existent, eternal intelligence as the cause of all things, to reach the goal of analysis, and it is done. But Materialism will never do that, never reach that goal. Mr. Putnam says the source of mind is protoplasm, that this is amply demonstrated, but does not tell us how that is demonstrated. It is simply assertion without a particle of proof, and that if we destroy protoplasm we destroy mentality—that is another assertion without proof. "Let human intelligence entirely vanish, what we call the material universe would still exist." That does not prove that protoplasm is the source of mind—that the material universe exists after human intellect has vanished—because it has not been proven that protoplasm is the source of mind. It is merely assumed that it has been proven, by making the assertion, that is all. Just like most of the arguments that are advanced to prove that mind is the result of material organization, no argument at all, nothing but assumption.

But to continue the investigation of this design question. I hav heard it asserted that there was nothing in the works of nature that gave any evidence of design, and those who advocate that theory generally go as far away in the universe as they can for their facts or fictions to substantiate those views, far away beyond the comprehension of ordinary intellects; to the fixed stars, the nebula, the milky way, the formation of worlds, or something of that sort, to confuse and bewilder the mind instead of coming right home to familiar and well-known facts to prove the truth of their theory. Now, I propose to commence here with myself, and what is true in respect to myself would be true in the same manner with every other person in the world. The eye shows design. Nothing could be plainer than that the eye was constructed for the purpose of vision for seeing, and a most wonderful piece of mechanism it is, too, and answers the design for which it was constructed completely. There can be no mistake as to the design of that organ for the purpose to which it is applied, giving us a view of the outside world, by means of which we can store our minds with knowledge that could be obtained in no other way. And the ear is another organ peculiarly constructed for another purpose—to aid us in our intercourse with the outside world in cases where the eye alone would be useless, but where the sense of hearing would be of the greatest advantage to us—perhaps the means of saving our lives, and of the greatest service to us in thousands of ways here in this life. That organ shows design, if anything can do so—that it was constructed for the very purpose for which it answers. Nothing else could supply its place. The hands are constructed for a purpose, and they answer the design, fulfil the purpose for which they were peculiarly formed. There is no mistake about it. They are all right for the use they are to be put to. If anything shows design, these members of the body do, and so with the arms. The length, the joints, the proportion, and everything about their structure show design. The feet show by their peculiar construction that they were designed for the very purpose of walking and balancing the body in an erect position in our movements from place to place here on earth.

But it is needless to enumerate every member of our body. Every organ of our physical system shows design, an intelligent design, and the fact that all these peculiarities are the same in all the millions of the human race proves that they could not hav come by chance. But they must be in accordance with fixed laws, and the result of one, and only one, designer and maker.

I will just refer to another of Mr. Putnam's statements in the article heretofore mentioned on page 742 of The Truth Seeker, November 24, 1883. He says: "Let it be distinctly understood what we mean by saying that mind is the result of matter. We do not mean that it is a form of matter. Mind is not matter, however subtil and ethereal. Neither is it a property of matter, or quality, or attribute; neither is it an entity or thing. It is simply a process. It is a movement, an activity. The soul of man is not a substance; it is action, action, action—wonderful, magnificent, far-reaching, piercing, and penetrating; but action, and nothing more. Why this action, called mind, results from certain organizations of matter, is more than we can tell. That problem, at present, is not solved. It may be eventually, but the difficulties are immensely simplified the moment we admit that mind is a process and not a thing." Now just let us take a peep at this logic. How is this mind, that is not a form of matter, that is not matter, that is not a property of matter, or quality, or attribute, neither an entity or thing, going to act? I should like to know. How is nothing going into action, wonderful, magnificent, far-reaching, piercing, penetrating, but action and nothing more? Well may he say that this problem is not solved. Can we conceive of a movement, unless there is something to move? Of action unless there is something to act? Could a greater absurdity be presented to our understanding than such a proposition as that? And that is, really, the solution of Materialism, and nothing more or less. That is the argument to prove that there is no God—simply nothing, with the bottom knocked out of that, to carry out the inconsistency of such nonsense offered as argument. Is it any more inconceivable how there can be an eternal existence, intelligent or material, of which we hav the positiv evidence, in the fact that both exist, or the material, at any rate, which Mr. Putnam admits, than that nothing can act in such far-reaching, piercing, penetrating a manner, as is described in that statement? I cannot see that the admission of such a proposition as that is lessening the difficulties of solving the problem of the universe, but on the contrary, can only see that it would be utterly impossible to solve anything in that way with nothing. Most wonderful is science! Mr. Putnam says, as I understand him from statements made in the same column just preceding this peroration of action, action, action, that the only way to escape the force of this reasoning, that mind is not the result of protoplasm or material organization, is to affirm that we know the outside universe solely through mental action; that is, that we infer the existence of the material universe from the operation of the mind; we only know mind directly, it is said, and, from that direct knowledge, we reason to the existence of the universe itself. This seems a very plausible assertion, and, if true, says Mr. Putnam, of course mind is the reality, and matter the shadow. But what mind is the reality? Simply my own mind. The universe, I infer; and Mr. Andrews and all other minds, I infer. I don't know that the universe exists. I don't know that Mr. Andrews exists. I only know that I exist.

Mr. Andrews is the shadow of a shadow, the inference of an inference. This is simply nonsense. I think so, too—simply nonsense; for in the first place there is no evidence to prove that it is true; and in the next place, what difference could it make with the mental action of the mind whether it was the result of protoplasm or not? and again how could it reason at all if the mind is nothing but an action, the result of protoplasm or material organization, and not a thing or entity? The reason must be in the protoplasm or organization, of which the mind is the result, action only, and nothing more. But I know that it is myself—my own mind—that is reasoning, and that all my actions and conclusions are the result of that reasoning. If not, then I do not know that I exist; and if I don't know that I exist, then I don't know anything. So that if we assume that the mind is the result of protoplasm, we are in just as bad a muddle as if the mind came to be in some other way, as a separate and independent thinking power, as it is just as capable of solving the problem of the universe as if it was derived from a cabbage-head.

I hav always supposed that I was a being, an entity, some ego, myself, intellectually, but am now informed that I am only an action, and nothing more. That is, that all that I know myself by, and all the intelligent self I know myself to be, is nothing but an action, but a pretty long one, for I can remember back quite a length of time, and of performing a great many actions myself, but all those actions were of short duration—did not last as long as I hav. They ended as soon as they were performed, and that was all there was of them; they hav gone into oblivion. But I am here yet. I hav performed many a day's work in my life, or at least I supposed they were within my lifetime; retired to rest at night, and hav arisen again in the morning, and supposed that it was all correct, did not know or think that my actions knew anything of themselvs which they must hav done if they were like me, if I am only an action. I never heard any of them say that they knew what was going on, and they hav all died out, and I am here yet, a stationary old action, too rough and solid to be killed off very easily. But science must prevail, and there is no sense in trying to overcome science with any such nonsense as that I am an entity, an ego by myself, or that any intelligent existence is, though Mr. Putnam calls himself an ego, which I suppose he would hav us understand to be an intelligent being, and applies the same term to others, as Mr. Andrews, that he recognizes as an ego different and separate from himself, as if he was something more than an action, which he says is not an entity or thing, but simply a process, a movement, an activity. I hav made these references to Mr. Putnam's propositions as to the origin of mind because they seem to come within the how of what is, is, the same as the question of intelligent design is introduced to show how the universe came to exist as it does, whether organized and controled by an intelligent designer, or evoluted from inanimate matter into the various forms and phenomena exhibited in the works of nature, without design, or whether evolution is not the result of a designing, invisible intelligence, so that if mind is the result of material organization, as is claimed, it would amount to the same thing; organization only being the means or process by or through which the result is accomplished, the intelligent designer acting back of this evolution, or in this evolutionary process, as I believe, for I cannot conceive it possible that intelligence could exist here with us, as we know it does, without an intelligent cause. I can understand plainly enough that such a cause must be eternal. But how it is eternal I cannot understand any more than I can understand how I exist. Yet I know that I am, and that what is, is, whether I can understand it or not. If I don't know that I exist, then I don't know that anything exists, and there may be nothing in existence after all, and this idea places everything out of the range of reason. But that is what I must believe—that all that appears to be is not, that the throngs of thousands upon thousands of men, women, children, and everything else that we see moving on the face of this our earth are not; that it is all a mistake; that I am not here myself, writing and thinking, before I can believe there is no God, no eternal, self-existent intelligence at the head of and all through all, and in all, the life of all life, the supreme ruler, the source of all power, ever acting and moving in the material universe, the same as my soul or spirit exists within, and is the life and power that makes me the I am that I am.

Protectiv Tariff.

Protectiv tariff is a stimulant to the manufacturer—what liquor is to the inebriate. A little does at first, but after awhile the system craves more, the first quantity ceases to be sufficient to satisfy the disordered organs of acquisitivness, which demand more, more; and may be denominated the second downward step from manhood's true condition of independence—the first step being when they stooped to the degrading position of asking the many (consumers) to giv to the few (manufacturers).

From self-reliance to abject dependence is the certain result of intemperance and of protection.

There is no bottom to this quagmire of false pol tical economy. The debasing habit of asking alms of the government at the expense of other classes of a nation is sure to bring its own reward. Not long before the delirium tremens willbegin to show itself. The system has become too much saturated to unload itself, and it sees "snakes in its boots," or, in other words, failure stares them in the face. It is death to stop and death to go on. Their business has been carried on with borrowed capital, or, in other words, profits hav been stolen, outrageously taken from other sources than legitimate ones. An unhealthy state of manufactures is brought on—a surplus of products without a corresponding consumption. Foreign markets are shut off, and shops hav to shut down, and laborers hav to suffer for the necessaries of life. Commerce is ruined; products hav cost so much that they cannot be sold in foreign ports without loss; and the cry is "More, more! giv us more! (whisky) subsidies in the shape of protection, or we die."

If the true physician prescribes that which common sense teaches, a lessening amount of stimulant and an increase of manhood, the whole pack start in a moment and he has to take himself off. But the false, the fraud, and quack puts in his appearance, and with his flattery agrees with the patient that it is more which will relieve him, and receives great patronage and large sums of money, and great is the quack.

There was never in the world's history a more false theory promulgated, unless it was the Christian doctrin, which is also protecting in its teaching—protecting the guilty rascal from the punishment he richly deserves.

When manufactured articles can be shipped to different parts of the world and sold at a profit, then we will hav a commerce again, and not before. When we take articles of food to foreign countries and exchange for things that they can make cheaper than we can make them, their laborer will stay there and not trouble us, and our own laborer will be benefited thereby.

If I obtain money by my industry, I claim that I hav an inalienable right to purchase where I can get the best and cheapest, without paying another man or set of men anywhere from one to hundreds per cent for the privilege to do so.

Are consumers a commodity, that a corner can be made upon them, the same as wheat, corn, or other commodities? Giv me the exclusiv right to manufacture an article of general use and prohibit the consumers (my commodity) from purchasing elsewhere, and I could get tolerably well off, or, in other words, I would be well fixed.

Out upon such stuff! Giv us freedom, loosen the shackles which are being drawn around us, which are sapping our very life-blood and making us slaves to monopolies and money corporations.

The history of our country will bear me out when I say that the country prospered the most when nearest free trade, and vice versa.

Yours truly, M. E. ROSE.

Liberal Christianity.

From The New Thought.

Of all the inconsistent humbugs in this world, the one known as Liberal Christian is the most sublimely ridiculous. There is no such thing as Liberal Christianity; there can be no such thing. That which is Liberal is not Christian, that which is Christian cannot be Liberal.

Christianity is a scheme to save fallen man. Hell-deserving sinners are by its manipulations to learn how to escape justice and get a heaven, to which they could never by their own merits hav been entitled.

Now, there are thousands who call themselvs Liberal Christians who do not believe the fundamentals of Christianity. If man has not fallen, how can he be restored? If there is no hell, from what will you save men? If Jesus is a man only, how can he be a mediator between God and man?

Dr. Thomas, for instance, wanted to remain in the Christian church. The Methodists very consistently turned him out. He had no affiliation with them. He believes none of their dogmas; why should he want to train with them? The Methodists are trying to raise men out of depravity and save them from hell; and all this by the blood of one of their gods. Dr. Thomas holds no sentiments in common with the Methodists; they did right in disfellowshipping him.

Now, if doubters, Infidels, Spiritualists, and progressers generally would cease to bow to the Grundy family—if they would come out and say, "Christianity has become a synonym for exploded superstitions, and therefore I am not a Christian," the Christian superstition would soon be consigned to sleep in its grave along with other exploded follies.

Let us no longer try to galvanize into respectable life the putrid carcass known as Christianity; a carcass which should long since hav been buried from sight.

Pamphlet Notices.

"The Legend of Gautama Buddha" is a mine in itself, and should be read by every Liberal, then presented to Christians. Only 5 cents.

In James Beeson's "Essay on the Ownership of Land" (Water Valley, Miss.) I find much to admire and nothing to condemn.

Professor Grayston's Normal School, Liberal, Mo., should be well patronized by Liberals. Please take notice and send for the announcement circular.

More valuable matter crowded into 46 pages it has never been my good fortune to read than is found in "The Bible—What Is It?" by J. D. Shaw, editor and proprietor of the Independent Pulpit, Waco, Texas. Price 25 cents.

Professor Joseph Henry's "Essays on Deaths and Funerals" are well worth the attention of Freethinkers who do not wish to be entombed in orthodox fashion. Your humble servant positivly forbids any services following her death. The professor's address is Salina, Kansas. Pamphlet, 25 cents.

"Separation of State and Church," by Karl Heinzen, is by far the most radical and best work I hav ever read on the subject. He advocates "church annihilation as an organized power of the priests to use the belief for the enslavement of the believers, for the plunder of the people." Price 10 cents.

Professor A. B. Bradford's lecture on the "Model Saints of the Old Testament" should be read to every religious audience at least once a month, that a true knowledge may be gained of the Bible character of the heroes and heroins of Christian canonization, as clergymen, superintendents, and teachers of Sunday-schools carefully avoid mentioning the salient points in the lives of these distinguished gentlemen and ladies.

"Something New. A Society Called the National or Anti-Christian Burial Society" organized recently in Boston, Mass. Membership fee, 25 cents. The society, free of expense, will furnish a Freethought speaker at funerals within one hundred miles of Boston. Liberals now can hav no excuse for patronizing Christian services on these occasions. For further particulars see Boston Investigator, June 4th, and address Geo. N. Hill, State st., Boston, Mass. ELLA E. GIBSON.

Barre, Mass., June 4, 284.

"THE foundation of fact is a good thing, even for the most impassioned rhetoric," says the Christian Advocate. "One of our preachers got it into his mind that a brother had been terribly burnt rescuing one of his children. But in point of fact the brother was intoxicated, and went to sleep in a brick-kiln. The congregation scoffed when the preacher made a pathetic reference to the honorable scars of the heroic father."

"THE Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac," 25 cents.

Sunday Concerts in the Parks.

The pressure of enlightened public sentiment has at length become strong enough to overcome the opposition of the churches of this city to Sunday open-air concerts, and last Sunday Central Park was filled by thousands of men, women, and children whose opportunities for listening to good music are restricted to Sundays and evenings.

Every year the park commissioners hav been asked to change the time of the weekly concerts from Saturday to Sunday afternoon, but the churches hav been solidly opposed, and the commissioners refused. This summer the pressure has been greater, and the opposition less, for during the past year great strides hav been made in Liberalizing public sentiment. Orthodoxy has lost its grip in this town, and Sunday diversions are common and cheap. The commissioners hav felt the change and drifted with the tide, and the result is that the people are now to be favored every Sunday with a magnificent classical-music concert.

Philadelphia has enjoyed such for the past three weeks in Fairmount Park, last Sunday the press reporting some fifty thousand listeners. The music is furnished by private business enterprise, the traditions of the city forbidding the authorities to use public money for "desecrating the Sabbath." For four Sundays past Boston Common has been visited by thousands, attracted by music provided by the city. Though this has been the rule for six years, the Lord has not destroyed the place. At first the music was sacred, but that feature has been dropped gradually, as the people preferred such lively airs as "Milliken's Galop" and Meyerbeer's "Robert the Devil." In Chicago, Milwaukee, and other Western cities Sunday is an enjoyable holiday, and though the preachers of all these places predict a rapid journeying of the populace toward the lower regions, the world moves on without any catastrophes traceable to this source.

All these signs mark the disintegration of Christianity, and the triumph of common sense. A superior entertainment is better than a cast-iron statute to empty the loafers' chairs in the corner saloons.

Mr. Walker.

Mr. E. C. Walker denies that he has given any evidence of a desire to load the League down with a "large number of side issues," and says that in assuming that he does so desire we are in error.

This is pleasant, truly. Mr. Walker is coming around, and has changed his mind since last year. But we must correct him on one point. It was exactly the Milwaukee platform we had in mind in replying to Seward Mitchell, and we understood Mr. Mitchell to mean the same. Mr. E. C. Walker was a member of the League Committee appointed in 1882 at St. Louis to draft a body of "issues," and report at Milwaukee. Mr. Walker accepted the mission, and made no protest then against the League making new demands. When the platform was presented at Milwaukee, he, representing the minority of the committee, spoke against a few only of the planks. The report, prepared for us at the time by the secretary and revised by the president of the League, reads:

"E. C. Walker, representing the minority of the same, read a report dissenting from a few radical declarations and demands as they exist in the report of the majority. It was received with the understanding that it be considered in connection with the majority report."

If he objected to a few only out of some thirty new propositions, we submit that the expression "a large number" was justifiable. Or if he objects to most of them, say two-thirds, there would be left ten new planks—a very large number considering their nature.

But all this is a side issue itself. Mr. Walker, at Milwaukee, did not object to the League being made a horse on which every member could pile his individual hobby. He objected to the planks that controverted his ideas, that is all. Had the platform been entirely anarchistic, anti-prohibitory, and radical on the marriage question, those lengthy and unfavorable reviews in Lucifer would hav been unnecessary. His present letter is a model of how to seem to say it, but not to.

The Petition for State Secularization.

When this petition was first printed it was the intention to present it to this Congress, but the heated political campaign upon which the country is just entering has forced everything else to one side, and the prospect of getting the "prayer" acted upon was not considered propitious. Mr. Curtis, the mover in this matter, agrees with us that the postponement will be advantageous to the interests of Liberalism, and it is so ordered. By pursuing this course the list of signers can be greatly lengthened, which will add correspondingly to the effect. There is nothing the politicians fear so much as a long list of voters who mean business. If the League had a thousand auxiliaries, with each a membership of a hundred, its demands would be almost immediately granted. A petition with a few hundred thousand names rightly presented and vigorously advocated will limber up the knees of the members of both houses.

Roll up the names!

Mr. Hale's Errors.

In a voluminous contribution in this week's issue Mr. James Hale essays some criticism of Mr. Putnam, Mr. Wettstein, and, incidentally, the editor. In the sinuous course of his manuscript he makes some ludicrous errors in reasoning. For instance, he asks those who reason that if everything that exists has been created, "God," provided he exists, must also hav been created, how it can be that matter is eternal; and he says "it is just as inconceivable how this material universe could hav eternally existed, as that an intelligent supreme being could hav eternally existed."

It seems surprising that Mr. Hale does not see the absurdity of thus placing upon an equality a product of the imagination and a reality, a speculation and a fact. That matter is eternal is logically demonstrable; that there exists an intelligent supreme being is not demonstrable in any way. It is solely a speculation of philosophy, and an assumption by theology. In a knowledge of this "being" we are no farther ahead than the world was two or three thousand years ago. All we hav is empty words and names. Ideas of "God" hav proceeded from innumerable religious fancies, which, in turn, originated in fear of natural phenomena and ignorance of their cause. "God" was the hobgoblin of the nursery of the race, and the priests the self-elected nurses who kept the children quiet by mentioning in scared whispers his terrible name. In this age men hav mostly outgrown this gross conception, but, unable to account for all the mysteries they behold, some conjure up a "Supreme Intelligence," an "Absolute," or an "Infinit Energy." The difference between these conceptions and the ideas of the early man is precisely the difference existing between the knowledge men had then and that which they hav now. One conception is no more demonstrable than the other.

The material universe, on the other hand, or matter, is here. It is seen, felt, weighed, tasted, heard, smelt, analyzed. Not a particle can be destroyed, not an atom created. It is, therefore, immortal, eternal; the changes taking place in its forms are but the accretions and dissolutions of organic and inorganic tissues, and not creations and utter extinctions. It has passed to an axiom that out of nothing nothing can arise. But until something can be created from nothing, matter must be admitted to be eternal. A fiat creation is an impossibility, and complete annihilation equally so. This is scientifically established, and cannot be denied. How absurd, then, to compare the existence of the material universe with the existence of that which is and can be at best but speculativly cognized! "No man hath known God at any time."

Mr. Hale sees, also, design in things as they are, and he assumes that it is intelligent. Supposing all things were exactly opposit to what they are—Mr. Hale would hav seen design in that, too, and could hav adduced precisely as logical reasons for so doing. But in "design," as Kant says, our intellect admires a wonder which it has itself created, for "how can we speak of design, knowing the objects only in one form and shape, and having no idea how they would appear to us in any other? What natural contrivance is there which might not be imagined to be rendered more perfect in design?" The arrangements in nature in which design is apparently seen are but the result of influences acting according to natural law. Nature makes many abortiv attempts, which fail because conditions change. What design is there in a blasted potato-field or frost-bitten peach crop? In the perpetual struggle for existence, as shown by Darwin, only those forms are able to sustain themselvs which possess some, however feeble, advantage over their contemporaries. What, then, could the design hav been in bringing into existence the weaker forms of plants and animals, which the "supreme intelligent being" must hav known would perish? "The multitude of living beings," says De Jouvencel, "presents itself before us not as the execution of a natural plan, but as a historical result, continually modified by a multitude of causes which hav acted consecutivly, and in which every accident, every irregularity, represents the action of a cause." This being so, if every action has a cause, the chain of cause and effect cannot be broken, and there would be no necessity for the "supreme intelligent being" after he had put in action the first cause. And that brings us right around to the cause of offense to Mr. Hale, who says that "to ask the question, who made God, is dodging or begging the very question at issue." But he will see that it is imperativ that it be asked, for if God is the "Great First Cause," he is and must also be the Great First Action, and if every action has its cause he is his own cause, its action, and the result—a manifest impossibility.

The only alternativ, therefore, is that matter is eternal, and has been acting eternally, and that the "Great First Cause" never could hav existed. But this latter hypothesis is perfectly demonstrable. United to matter is force, revolving in the same never-ending cycle, and emerging from any form in the same quantity it entered. Force may be latent, but is never lost, and in all places where it is manifested may be reduced to its sources, or to the other forces that contributed either directly or by conversion to its expression. Force, as heat, light, electricity, etc., etc., is inherent in matter, inseparable from it, and co-eternal with it, and like it can never be created or destroyed. Matter and force is the eternal pair from which hav evolved all the combinations in the universe—plants, animals, men, all the organic and inorganic things. This conclusion is the only escape from the vicious circle which ends where it started by asking, Who made God? Modern natural science, Buechner says, has pretty much emancipated itself from the empty notion of design, abandoning the assumption to those who contemplate nature rather with the eyes of the feelings than with those of the intellect. For as there was a time when no organic life existed on earth, and a time will come when the physical forces now existing will be plunged into night and death, what, in the presence of such facts, are the pompous phrases of a philosophy about the designs which became accomplished in the creation of man—what are the life and efforts of man himself compared with the external, inexorable, irresistible march of nature? There is no need nor room in the economy of this nature for a supersensual supreme intelligent being.

A New Liberal Industry.

B. F. Butler is the cause of two ridiculously baseless remarks in the last issue of Wakeman & Leland's paper. One is by Mr. W. T. Doty, the writer of the "Secular Notes," the other by Mr. Wakeman himself. Mr. Doty proclaims that

"The intolerant opposition to Bradlaugh is like that against B. F. Butler in this country."

In defending his political hero Mr. Wakeman says:

"General Butler has been wise enough to obtain a competence, but he has worked hard and done it honestly in law, politics, and war. In doing it he has justly cared little for party, but he has been true to common honesty, to the union, to the rights of labor, of financial reform, and Liberalism whenever he could do it a service."

Now, we hav no hatred of Mr. Butler. In the light of present knowledge, we would as soon vote for him as for Blaine, or any man the Democrats are likely to nominate. But to compare Butler's position in politics to Bradlaugh's is to show lack of historical accuracy—or the other thing. To claim for him services to Liberalism is pure and gratuitous assumption. Man should leave to the regular party papers the labor of creating virtues for a candidate.

The Liberal League and a New Departure.

In view of the best interests of Liberalism, and the vast results involved, I think there should be a full and frank expression of each one's opinion. There should be no reserve or false delicacy. It is not a question of men, but of principles and methods of action. We must do what is wise no matter at what sacrifice. It is not for this or that man's success we aim, but for the advancement of our cause, and so the welfare of the world.

To me Liberalism is the life of humanity, and being everything, the simple truth should be spoken, for no sure progress can be made except by the most absolute square dealing with one another. We talk together on this great subject as friends and not as enemies. The motivs of none should be impugned. If we are thoroughly honest, the noblest counsels will undoubtedly prevail.

Let the dead past bury its dead. If mistakes hav been made, those mistakes cannot be changed. We must turn to the future and make the most of the opportunities that lie before us. We learn from the past, but we choose and act for the time to come.

In the first place, I will say that I fully indorse the position taken by the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. There must be concentration of effort. The League cannot do everything. It cannot take up all the reforms of the day. Each reform must hav its separate method and law of growth. The business of the League is to furnish the basis of all reforms, namely, absolute free thought. This is mission enough for any one organization, and in the present state of the world is the grandest mission of all. Freedom of thought has not yet been attained, nor its correlativ, freedom of action. Man is yet in the toils of superstition and slavery, and no reform can ever advance to assured victory except in the atmosphere of liberty. Let us hav liberty, scientific liberty, and every true reform will be successful.

I affirm this, therefore, to be the one and all-controling purpose of the League. It should insist upon freedom and confine itself to this one issue, and make perfect the condition of human progress, and giv ample room and range to every thought and wish. It should create a liberty so glorious and stimulating that every generous impulse shall be most fruitful, and every keen insight and lofty ideal be made practicable.

But while I believe in concentration, I do not believe in compromise. I hate compromise. It is always a backward step and a sacrifice of the eternal truth. Compromise for the sake of a larger following is death to every noble enterprise. It is the refuge of the weak, the wavering, and the faithless. Better a corporal's guard and the truth, than a whole army and half the truth. Half a truth is sometimes worse than a whole lie, for it detracts, tortures, belittles the conscience, and corrupts the moral nature.

Hitherto the League has been true to principle—it has been loyal to the fundamental verities of Freethought. If now, after having achieved so much, it should turn back, put its flag at half-mast, and strive for anything less than absolute freedom, I am frank to say that I should hav no more interest in the League. It would turn to dust and ashes. It would hav no rallying-cry and no inspiration. It would be but a feebler form of orthodoxy. It would help rivet some chain on tortured and struggling humanity. No, let us be true, no matter how small our numbers. Let us vindicate the unalienable rights of every human soul. Let us be the pioneers of advancement. Let our call be the trumpet call of absolute sincerity and truth.

Concentration of effort on fundamental ideas, with no compromise whatsoever, should, I say, be the law of our future work, otherwise there will be no juices and no fruit. The tree we hav planted will die and the waters of life flow on to nourish some nobler growth.

But while I abhor all compromise, I am in favor of the most inclusiv methods of action. I do not believe in passing so many resolutions. Resolutions amount to nothing. It is action that tells. Liberty is not a doctrin, it is a growth, and slowly does the world understand its immeasurable meaning. Language is limited, and if we undertake to bind people with resolutions and platforms, then our area of fellowship is contracted—not by a principle, but by a method of expressing that principle. When the time comes we must express ourselvs, of course, and speak in clarion tones, but better, far better, the lightning deed than the thunder of a long string of resolutions. Too many are satisfied with high sounding phrases. These may do for a time of peace, but not for a time of war. In war we want the vigorous blow, not merely the brave word. Let our declaration of principles then be as simple as possible. Let us affirm the principle without abatement, but let its thousand-fold interpretation and expression be for each man's earnest search. While undeviating touching basic truth, we will be thoroughly inclusiv as to the methods by which it shall leap to life and action. Words are necessarily sectarian, and hav split mankind into innumerable creeds. The truth itself has never yet divided man; it is the verbal outcome of truth that has done this. Let us avoid multiplicity of words, let them be few and strong, stirring and comprehensiv, that shall unify and not separate. Words are but counters, symbols, and reflections of ideas, and to put the word in the place of the ideas is, of all things, the most illiberal.

Concentration, no compromise, but Liberality of method, is what I would insist upon.

Furthermore, in regard to political action, I think it should be entirely negativ, and not positiv. What we should do in that line is included in the Nine Demands. Let us make good these demands, and we shall do a very great and far-reaching work. Upon these demands we are united, but when we attempt more there will be division in our ranks. Positiv political action must be left to other organizations. I am not much in favor of positiv political action anyway. The ballot, as things now are, is a compulsory force, and cannot be aggressivly used by Liberals until it has changed its character and become simply a moral power. I am entirely in favor of a voluntary form of government. This is the ideal toward which every true reformer must aim. The ultimate of human government is what Stephen Pearl Andrews so well names a guided spontaneity, and to attain that our present brutal form of state administration must be overthrown. Hence the League must confine itself to negativ political action, to limiting the functions of the state, to cleaning out ecclesiasticism and all tyranny, and so prepare the way for a finer evolution of social harmony. The positiv work of the League should be entirely social, outside of politics, building up neighborhood amenities, and urging moral and artistic developments upon the basis of Freethought.

Concentration, no compromise, liberality of method, negativ political action in accordance with the Nine Demands, and positiv work only in the larger life of society, of which politics is the mere shell, eventually to be sloughed off—these will furnish right conditions for the success of the League.

I now come to the most important point of all—a change of method of leadership. If this change is not made, we can, I think, win only partial success; if made, we know not what power we may attain in a few short years. I mean this: we must put at the head of our forces, we must choose for the president of the League, a man who can devote his entire time to the affairs of the League, who shall make this the business of his life. We do not want the tenth, or the third, or the half of a man's time and energy, but the whole of it. No man can meet the demands now made upon the League unless he givs himself heart and soul to the work. If he is immersed in other pursuits, if he has some profession or business outside of the League to make drafts upon his attention and vitality, he cannot be the man for the place, however great his ability or enthusiastic his spirit. The time has come when the president of the League must be married to the League—take it for better or worse; surrender all else, and fling himself into the great work that lies before him. No vast movement in human history has ever been successful without this entire leadership. Rome has withstood the onsets of modern progress by means of this leadership. The churches to-day are vigorous because they hav such devoted officers. Let the church straggle along as Liberalism has straggled along hitherto, and where would it be at the end of a hundred years? It is trained leadership that built up the church, won all its victories, and saves it to-day from destruction. Trained leadership is what Liberalism must hav, or it cannot combat with the skilled hosts of the church. The church has thousands of trained and devoted captains. Should not Liberalism hav at least one? Look at the success of Bradlaugh and the secular movement in England, a success that never could hav been attained except Bradlaugh had given up all else and made leadership the work of his life.

Look also at the New York State Freethinkers' Association. Where would it hav been to-day if it had not been for the strenuous devotion of H. L. Green to its success? He gave everything to this work—all his life and all his energy—and in spite of enormous difficulties, what a success he has achieved! If Mr. Green had been engaged in other pursuits, and given only a part of his time to the cause of the association, that association to-day would hardly be alive. Mr. Green's meetings hav been the most successful and pregnant ever held upon this continent. And why? Because of the thoroughly business-like manner in which he has labored.

Who can build up a great paper without giving his entire time to it? Who can build up a great business without unqualified attention to it? And so with the work that now lies before the Liberal League. We must inaugurate Mr. Green's method. Our president must make a business of being president, and not hold the office merely as a side issue of a busy life, although, essentially, he may be the best man in our ranks, but having the pressure of a laborious profession, he is not the man we want, because the hour demands a whole man, and not a half. A whole man is worth a thousand half men.

The League has done little or nothing the past year; it has made no record simply because it has lacked this trained and devoted leadership. Messrs. Wakeman and Leland are eminent in ability, but they hav had other duties to perform, and so the League has suffered vitally, and I believe that another year or two of such half leadership will destroy the future successfulness of the League. On this matter I speak with the utmost frankness, because I deeply feel the necessity of the hour—that we must hav a new method, or the next quarter of a century will be frittered away in mere disintegrating effort. The next meeting of the League will make or mar its destiny.

I recognize fully the merits of Mr. Wakeman. He is a representativ man indeed. No one is more worthy in himself of the honor of being the president of the League. He would, therefore, still be my choice if he could surrender to the interests of the League every other pursuit, and devote himself without distraction to the advancement of our cause; but if he is so bound with his professional engagements, if other interests and duties are so peremptory that he cannot, as he himself declares, make this surrender, we must, as a matter of principle, accept his declination as final. I think that Mr. Wakeman should, without reserve, express his mind on this matter, in order that, without making unpleasant complications, we can select some new man on the basis of the new method. Since Mr. Wakeman declares that he cannot assume this responsible position, I would suggest another brave and gifted Liberal—George Chainey—as Mr. Wakeman's successor, a man of national reputation, of noble thought, of earnest spirit, and eloquent tongue. Free, as I understand him to be, from other pursuits, he can, without doubt, giv himself wholly to the League's work, and infuse into it new life and hope.

It is not a question of men, however, but of principle, of a right method of action. I will not vote for any mere figure-head, or any man to giv us respectability; or any man, however good in himself, who can render but a portion of his time. I want for this place in which so many high interests are centered, a whole man. I believe that all Liberals will see the wisdom of this, and will insist that he whom we select for our standard-bearer shall be selected not simply for his reputation, but because he can giv himself without stint to the interests of the League.

Let us meet by all means at Cassadaga Lake in conjunction with the New York State Freethinkers' Association. Let there be a representativ gathering. Let each one be courageous in the expression of his views. Our method of work is of the utmost importance. The cause is infinitly greater than any one man. Never were the opportunities of the League so great as now. But if for want of boldness and insight these opportunities are not rightly seized, they will not soon be presented again, and Liberalism will receive a wound in the house of its own friends. I hav spoken on this matter my innermost thought. Those who know me will know that I speak from no interested motiv. I hav nothing to gain or lose by what the League may choose to do. Messrs. Leland and Wakeman hav called for an expression of opinion, and here is mine for what it is worth. There must be a new departure indeed; not, however, in the way of compromise, but in fulness and greatness of work; and hence I am in favor of the election of some man like Chainey, who can devote his whole time to the cause. Unless we adopt this method of leadership, the power of Liberalism will not be felt as it should be felt, both to-day and in the hereafter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is not surprising that "the engraving of the monument printed last week givs great satisfaction," and let me 'add my feeble testimony" to the list of delighted friends. My sister regrets that Mr. Bennett's hand could not hav been visible grasping the pen. It is a very accurate likeness of Mr. Bennett as I first beheld him in 1874, though, perhaps, somewhat more youthful and less fraught with that deep thoughtfulness and care-worn expression apparent in late years. My engraving is already framed and adorns the walls of "my den," awaiting the receipt of the more artistic lithograph.

I wish to add that I agree perfectly with your Boston correspondent, R. S. Sidelinger, in his estimate of the merits of S. P. Putnam's "Waifs and Wanderings," and am glad it is to reappear in a book. Its sale is already assured. ELLA E. GIBSON.

CORTLAND, OHIO, June 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Who is this F. B. Livezey? He has sent me some circulars, which I do not understand. I cannot comprehend his meaning, unless it is ridicule, which seems to be his sole object. I consider him a lunatic at large. He is running down the best men and women we hav in the ranks of Freethought without any excuse whatever. He givs no cause for complaint. Well, the time is coming, I hope, when I can be able to procure Mr. Bennett's and R. G. Ingersoll's works, as well as other good reading your catalog contains. I lend the good old TRUTH SEEKER to all my neighbors who wish to read it, and I think you may look for some new subscribers shortly. I never tire of hearing Elmina speak her words of wisdom. She livs the life she was born to liv, and takes pleasure in making everyone happy within her reach—also many other contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Wishing you success, I remain, Yours truly, J. D. WHEELER.

ST. JOHNS, ARIZONA, June 21, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 14th, the $1.75 which I had the honor to contribute towards the Monument Fund is accredited to Alfred F. Vanta, which is wrong. I am a professed and outspoken Liberal; hav been for over twenty years, and do not deny my faith. Therefore, I do not want my contribution accredited to another or fictitious personage. If there is honor in erecting monuments in memory of our heroes (and I esteem D. M. Bennett one of them), and as I hav in a small way assisted in this matter, I wish to go correctly upon record. 'Tis true my contribution was a mere mite, nevertheless I think myself honored in honoring the memory of D. M. Bennett, and under these circumstances one naturally wishes to be properly and correctly represented. I care not who knows my views in matters of belief, nor how often they are howled from the house-tops. They are matters that concern no one but myself, and not being a hypocrit, I say just what I think, and think just what I say. Please make the necessary correction in the spelling of my mame.

MR. EDITOR: I hav cut the petition out, and hav a few names on it—all taxpayers. I am what you will call a tinker, and travel in Saratoga and Warren counties. I talk the petition up, and explain it. They all know that I am a Freethinker, and those I speak to are in favor of the churches paying taxes, and will vote that way, but are afraid to put their names down for fear some person might see them. A few years ago people were offended at me for talking about the Bible and religion, but it ain't so now. I hav parties at night in different houses as I travel along. I can talk better than I can write. They all think I am bold in saying what I do, and it is a wonder some religious person don't kill me. If any one can prove what I say is wrong, they are at liberty to show it up. I like to come across the silk-stocking paupers who liv on the stupidity of the people. My profession suits me to spread the light of truth. I find some bloodthirsty Christians who will do most anything for the love of their God. If the taxation of church property comes before the people, there will be a big vote in favor of it. Please send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. JOHN HART.

PROVIDENCE, June 12, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In last week's TRUTH SEEKER Mr. Wm. Watson replies to Mr. J. Petty. Perhaps it is bad form for me to "put in my oar," but I trust to be pardoned. I understand Mr. Watson to mean that choice of action may co-obtain with the impulsion by the strongest motiv, and yet the former be free and independent of the latter. This reminds me of an incident. When I was a lad I was very wilful. Not having a father, I generally had my own way. But I had a big uncle who was not afraid of me. One day mother wanted me to go to market. I would when I got ready. A deep-toned masculin voice sounded from another room, and I got ready quick. When out of sight I was pouting and sauntering along, and in a sudden rage threw the basket ahead af me. I at once found myself seated on tbe strong hand of my uncle and wafted through the air at a terrible speed in the direction of the basket. I was impelled by such a strong motiv that I chose my course at once.

Now, friend Watson may be right, but I consider free agency and free will as superfluous terms when applied to actions which are attributed to motivs. When a new and stronger motiv supersedes the present one I will stop writing. For instance, suppose I learn that by starting at once I can get a million dollars in Europe, I should not write this article, for with a million I could start lots of Freethought journals.

OMRO, WIS., June 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please giv space in your columns for a brief report of the meeting held at this place June 6th, 7th, and 8th. The speakers present were Judge Holbrook, of Chicago; Mrs. L. M. Spencer, of Milwaukee, and G. H. Brooks, lately from Kansas.

The judge's lecture was mainly his own experience in his investigation of Spiritualism, and was well received. Mrs. Spencer's were given under control, and after each gave tests to the audience, describing spirits, etc., which were mostly recognized. Mrs. Spencer is not what the majority would call a first-class speaker, but is growing rapidly, and without doubt at no distant day will stand in the front rank of reformers. She is doing a grand work in Milwaukee. G. H. Brooks is a young speaker, having been in the field but a short time. He speaks in a semi-trance from questions given him by the audience, and I predict for him a brilliant future. The discuss ions throughout were highly practical at each session. This is the first meeting held since our organization was perfected. We hav large numbers of names on our books, and wish every place in Wisconsin containing a Spiritualist represented at our next meeting. So, friends, send the secretary your names, with one dollar, which will constitute you a voter in all business matters pertaining to our society.

The railroads extended the courtesies of reduced rates to attendants, and no doubt the same will be given at the next meeting. The attendance was good throughout, and the interest marked. Representativs from Chicago, Milwaukee, Fond du Lac, Oshkosh, Ripon, Oconomowoc, Weyauwega, and Milton Junction were present. The meeting closed with best of harmony. The next meeting will be held at Omro, Sept. 5th, 6th, and 7th, 1884. DR. J. C. PHILLIPS, Sec.

DRIFTWOOD, PA., June 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed my subscription for next year. I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. In this orthodox village there are very few of us Liberals. The orthodox party in this community hav often insulted me with such remarks as this—that if they believed as I do they would rob, murder, steal, or do anything that they desired. What a desire! One of the same class came to me one evening to borrow five dollars to aid him in time of great distress. I am poor, and could not do it. He insisted, and finally said he would swear to his God, giving him the privilege of paralyzing him if he did not pay the money. The time is out when it was to be paid, and that party is living and well.

An acquaintance came to my house two years ago, and died after some months' illness. I took care of him during the time and heard the last words he uttered on this earth, in which he stated that he did not believe in the orthodox hell, and had no fear of the like. I buried him in my lot in the cemetery. After all was over, the orthodox said that I prevented the clergy from coming to see him, which is false. He was buried according to his own desire. They often say they would like to hear what I would say when I come to die. If I die in my right mind it will be the same as now. I hope you may liv long and prosper. W. SCOTT.

AXTELL, KAN., June 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose the following, which I wish you to publish:

Died, in Greeley, Col., June 13, 1884, from the effects of an injury received years ago by playing base ball, Louis K. Mason. The deceased was born in Boston, Mass., about thirty-two years ago. His father moved near Dubuque, Iowa, and is a successful farmer, where Louis received a good education, and about six years ago came to Netawaka, Kan., bought and improved a farm, and married Elizabeth Wilson. He then sold that and moved to this place; bought and improved a fine farm here, which they now own. He was for years the only one taking THE TRUTH SEEKER here, but partly through his influence the cause spread until there has been as many as twenty-five copies sent to this office regularly. His Christian mother gave him a Bible and told him to read it. It said: "Prove all things and hold fast to that which is good." It also said: "The dead know not anything; neither is there any work or device in the grave whither thou goest. A man hath no pre-eminence over a beast; all die and go unto one place." That did not satisfy one seeking after a knowledge of the future, so he investigated Spiritualism, and in that he found the exposures of tricksters, and that it required a medium; that no word came direct to him, so he took for his motto, "To do good is my religion," and no man came nearer living up to his profession. Charitable to a fault, his word was as good as the bank; a good provider in his family, a faithful officer, an independent radical thinker and talker; kind hearted as a child, and ready at all times to giv his views on medicin, politics, and religion; all of which were of the most advanced sort. He lived a good and useful life. "The world is better for his having lived." He leaves a wife and two children; father and mother, brothers and sister, to mourn his loss, all of whom hav the sympathy of his many warm friends.

E. W. MINER.

ARROWSMITH, ILL., June 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Yesterday I received a roll of Livezey's circular letters. I laid them aside until to-day to read. The weather has been tolerably warm, and you bet I hav had a soporific game at reading them. This man Livezey seems determined, by the help of circulars, to gain the "pearly portals" of notoriety. If I was in the oroide business I should admire him for his brass. His manner of introducing himself is as shrewd as a sharper, and does not savor of crankiness, either. His plan is to engage Liberals in some kind of correspondence. Then he will garble their letters, interlacing his replies through them, hektographing a lot of them and sending them to near friends of the Liberal he thus engages. If the Liberal takes no note of his correspondence, he hektographs it to the Liberal friends anyway, and thus thrusts himself upon them unasked for. Of course a man will read a circular letter about his friend, and Livezey, knowing this, manages to hector himself into the most sacred places. In this his manner reminds me of a trickster instead of a gentleman.

I hav come to the conclusion that the "cause of Livezey" is uppermost in the mind of this celestial sign-post. There is one proposition with reference to the study of human nature that I find to be absolutely and universally true. That is, men hav numerous ways of acting for self-interest—the more indirect, the surer they are working toward that end. The gambler throws his dice for money, the priest throws his moans and groans for dreams; others seek to balk an imaginary hell by self-kindled hells, going through the world eyeless and tongueless, sexless, crippled, deaf; either to shame their gods or make themselvs stronger to suffer than hell is to harm. But we gain nothing by knowing this, except the pleasure, if it be one, of multiplying useless words. And, if Livezey chooses to buy heaven with his circulars, in what he supposes to be hell's hard market, he will find the toil begins as soon as the bargain is through.

In one line of his circular he requests Mrs. Severance to reply to his stuff. In another he impudently remarks that he "became disgusted with the littleness of woman controversy in an eight months' tilt wtth Madam Slenker." I should judge that to be an exhibition of his reasoning faculties, "divinely inspired." I can rather guess Mrs. Slenker got a fair exhibition of his bigotry in an "eight months' tilt," and I feel like congratulating her upon getting rid of him at this late date.

I do not admire the manner of Livezey's tactics in the least. If Liberals do not feel disposed to engage in a literary duel with him, he ought to hav sense enough to not hound them into public by hectoring their friends regardless of their wishes. Livezey is a schemer, and don't you forget it. If his name and manner of work stands for a complete system of religion, I should think it no small service to the cause of good sense and good taste to point out the contrast between his magnificent pretensions and his miserable performance.

Respectfully, PENN KIRK.

OGDEN, UTAH, June 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find petition for state secularization signed by myself and others, some of whom hav been Mormons, and who now reject it in every part that pretends to a saving power through John Taylor, and revelations from God to him. That Mormons are becoming more sensible to the light in which they are held by "Outsiders," that being the name the Mormons gave the other Christian orders, is perceptible. Here in Utah they designate us Liberals as Infidels, or any persons that will deny the system of creation as shown in the Bible. But as a general thing they giv us credit for having more sense than the orthodox Christians who believe to a certain extent in the same book, and then only that which suits their case best. They also make us Liberals or Infidels arbitrators of any disputes they may hav with outside Christians.

Another thing I will speak of happening here. A day or two after Blaine's nomination at Chicago, the Republicans here had a rally with torches, and a Rev. Mr. Atchinson, of the Methodist Episcopal church, made a speech, or attempted to do so. What a speech! more like a camp-meeting sermon, where God and the state were continually getting mixed up. He was a Republican, but would waive his claims on the party if he could get recruits for the Methodist Episcopal party, and would insure them an easy victory (he being one of the ballot counters). I take your paper through a newsdealer here, the only one coming that way. The dealers being good Christians don't order it in advance for fear it might eventually be the only order had here. There are quite a number of truth seekers in this city. We take pleasure in forwarding THE TRUTH SEEKER to those whom we think most need it. J. H. PARKS.

CAWKER CITY, KAN.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is just now striking such Thor-hammer blows on the advance political ideas of the times that it seems almost impossible for me not to try to be one among them. This Kansas is an advance state, but our city press is in the hands of the fossils, so I hav no chance to put in a word; and although I hav been favored with a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER several times, I pray you let me hav just one little space to giv just one new political idea relativ to the much-vexed question of protection versus free trade. It is the most common argument of the protectionists to say when told of the law encouraging partial or local advantages, "Oh, well, we are all one people; it helps us all." So now I wish, parrot-like, to say, Yes, we are all one people, and before the post-office law we are all treated the same, and treated well, and there is no complaint. So the new idea I wish to advance is for the government to be the carriers of all things with the same uniform rate of charges. The difficulties between the East, West, and South are at once settled, and settled justly. A bushel of wheat raised in Kansas or Colorado will bring as much to the producer as one raised in western New York, and a keg of nails made in Pittsburgh will cost no more in Kansas than in Cleveland. I know that this will meet with a terrible opposition until it is well ventilated, but no longer. I can remember when letters were charged according to the distance, and it is not many years since postage to California was double that east of the mountains. Remember we are all one family, and that some of us in the West and South hav contributed thousands of millions of dollars to the encouragement of manufactories in the East, and this even would be no favor. It is but placing the labor of every member of the family on an equality, and if this idea has not its foundation laid deep and sure in that ever-memorable declaration that men hav the same right in the pursuit of happiness, I am unable to comprehend the meaning of language, as also the meaning of all of one family, for certainly it can be of no use to be of one family if one gets the porridge and the other the spoon.

GEORGE W. CHAPMAN, M.D.

SOLDIERS' HOME, MILWAUKEE, WIS., June 27, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Let this 50 cents go to the Monument Fund, lest it be completed before I hav a chance to put in. My subscription ran out May 12th, when I wrote you in regard to my prospects for keeping up my paper. They are growing brighter. The Mexican Pension bill I mentioned has passed the Senate and will soon become a law. Never, since the time that the old Jewish God and his partner, sometimes called the devil, conspired together to try the patience of their servant Job, has the patience of any body been tried like the patience of those few old survivors of the Mexican war. We never lost a battle, and often five to one against us. We added to this government in two years and two months more wealth than we possessed before. Our bill has been kicked and cuffed about between the two political parties in Congress for ten years. Forty years, nearly, hav elapsed since that war, and now they grudgingly giv us the bare outlines of a living, eight dollars a month. It is true that some of us, who rendered service in the late war, also receive the benefits of those national homes where the government has kindly furnished us with both priest and preacher, who take turn-about in holding the inmates in ignorance and confusing their minds with samples of hell and heaven. When I came here over two years ago, I found THE TRUTH SEEKER on our reading-room table, but last fall, through the influence of priestcraft and villainy, it stopped; orthodoxy got in its work and deprived us of the only means by which we could confront them with their lies. However, it did not hurt the paper much, for I doubt whether they ever paid for it. It had the effect to cause some few others to scratch around and get a TRUTH SEEKER of their own, which is doing nearly as much good as when it lay on the reading-room table.

Mr. Editor, I wish you would tell Puck to show us how Blaine looked when secretary of state, rushing out of bed at midnight to issue resolutions of condolence to send to the Russians to let them know how bad we Yankees felt when their emperor's life was in danger. And when Puck gets this, I guess you had better put the rest in the waste basket, if it ain't full, as my friend, Ben Parkins, tells me that self-preservation is the first law of nature, and he is a philosopher and must know. Yours for truth, NELSON HUNT.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., June 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: And so the Monument is finished, and tender, loving friends hav consecrated it to truth; hav left it with us, the friends of him whose memory it commemorates, and to all of the present and the coming future generations, to be helped by its history in our work for the world. I would gladly hav been with you in your most interesting evening service, but surely there was no need of other speech or presence, so many good things were said, and just the appropriate things, by every speaker; but I want to say that I think none more appropriate than Mrs. Macdonald's. It was the fitting occasion to introduce to the lovers of THE TRUTH SEEKER its present editor and his brotherly assistant. Not once "too many times" does the mother tell of the devotion of these young men to our departed hero; and are we not every one of us more interested, if that were possible, in the success of the paper, when, through this well-timed introduction, we know that these, our friends, mother and sons, hav from the time of its first entrance into New York, a little four-month-old without home only as it was held close to the hopeful heart of its great originator—this woman, mother of sons, opened wide her arms and helped its young life to grow, till now it has become so large, so beautiful in its entire make-up, that we wonder how anybody can afford to be without it? Surely this was what we all wanted to know, and most sincerely we thank Mrs. Macdonald that she has told us the story in a true, womanly way. I trust she may always hav reason to be as proud of these sons as she is to-day, and that as editors they shall keep up the character of THE TRUTH SEEKER until its fame shall be such "that it shall be read and known of all men."

Massachusetts seems by her judges and lawyers to hav become quite ashamed of the persecution of Mr. Heywood, and so has quashed the indictment. I trust we shall hav a rest now, and be able to giv attention to something more agreeable than saving good people; we hav enough to do in saving bad people, though I confess to being more interested in people—human people—than in anything either above or below humanity. I suppose if only I were allowed "suffrage," I should be interested in some political party, certainly not in saving the Republican; and as it has thoroughly damned itself, I should not be needed for that purpose, so I may as well try to "bide my time." With a good hand-shake with all the lovers of humanity, I am, as ever, your co-worker and friend,

LUCY N. COLMAN.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been unable to do anything, as yet, about getting subscribers for the club I said I was going to make up. They do not all liv around here, and I am obliged to go slowly. I am working as hard as I can, and think I shall hav two or three more subscribers at least. I am pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and you can put me down as a life-long subscriber, as I never intend to be without it as long as I liv. The only regret I hav is that I hav not been a subscriber ever since the paper was started. I will do all I can for the cause and for your paper, but I cannot do much here. I am ashamed to say it, but I hav to get my paper directed to me under the name ———, which is not my name now, nor the name I go by, as I go by my step-father's name. The people up here are confounded, bigoted fools, but they will find some of their number Infidels if they stay here awhile. If you publish any letter from me, do not publish my name or where I am, as I am under the same conditions as that gentleman who was "upon the rack of persecution." But I hail that as a good omen, for it shows their inability to maintain their hobby against Infidels. You giv Christians a capital letter to their followers, so I giv Infidels the same. I am a Pantheist, and always was, although I hav been under the influence of Christian training. I never knew a happy day while I was a Christian, and I wonder how thinking men feel. As soon as I commenced to think, I doubted the whole system, and the struggles I endured to get out of the glamour of the accursed imposition I hope I shall never undergo again. I now take care of my health, do all the good I can, and I must say I think I lost nothing and gained a good deal by renouncing Christianity.

I will send for some more books as soon as I can get my things straightened a little. I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will continue to prosper, and that it will keep gaining subscribers until it becomes known and appreciated all over the world. You can rest assured I will giv it all the aid and advertising I can.

I see in my "Thirty Discussions," etc., that Mr. Bennett wanted to know how Christians make the two nights and one day that Jesus was in the earth to be the three days that Jesus said he should be in the earth. I will say that they were indefinit periods of time; and if anyone should find any like statement in the Bible, they must remember that if there is any apparent contradiction in reference to time in that holy book (?), they can account for it in that way.

I hav made one unbeliever in Christianity, and hav decided three who were wavering and in tormenting doubts.

I will continue to look out for subscribers, and will report as soon as I can. ———.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to see that the subject of cremation is agitating the minds of the people; there can possibly be no sound arguments presented against it, but much more good reasons for its adoption than the few sensible ones set forth in the article which appeared in your last issue. It quickly does what we know is bound to ultimately take place by the slow and disgusting process of decomposition of the body, the matter devoured by worms, and the bones to mold and crumble into dust. If there is anything revolting to our senses, it is the latter method of disposing of the dead.

There is nothing more purifying than the disintegration by fire, but, like religion, the minds of people hav been educated to abhor incineration as a heartless method; they think God would hav more trouble in collecting the gases, and fixing them up to look respectable that final day when graves will open for the dead to rise. Viewing all these absurdites in a sensible light, it strikes us that the world is composed of lunatics, rather than the sensible people we claim to be, although we can look back on the dark ages when people miracled, and attributed it to some unseen something that some giv the name God, and others by some other nickname. We can see progression, it is true, but how slowly it comes! At the same rate, thousands of years, perhaps, will be required to evolute the masses from the silly superstitions that so many are sadly diseased with now; but when the time does come, happy will be those fortunates that then liv. Then the poor and helpless and needy will receive the aid that is now worse than squandered building fine churches and paying large salaries to such drones as inhabit these useless edifices, disclaiming a teaching that, if followed, would demoralize a good people.

When this useless tirade can be dispensed with in the halls of Congress, in the army and navy, and every other department, and the millions saved that are now wasted annually, we will see less pauperism, less crime, better morals, and in every way a happier people; our taxes will no longer be a burden to keep down the poor and oppress the rest. The thousands of sleek, well-fed, well-dressed impostors who are living now from the sweat of the laborer's brow will themselvs become self-supporting, or else can starve and don their celestial robes and wings to embark for the promised land of milk and honey, where the expense will be far less for their keeping.

Yours truly, for reason and reform, H. B. JONES.

P.S.—I wish to add my acquiescence in what you say to Mr. Sewart Mitchell, in reference to those side issues. As you say, we shall hav done a great work when we accomplish the main issue for which we are striving. If a man is sick, the principal cause of which proceeds from the liver, or some other organ, first relieve the grand cause, and the rest will right themselvs. Let us by all means, I say, bind our whole energies to relieve the grand cause of all trouble, "superstition," and the rest of the work goes easy. But should we attempt to do those minor evils, in which there are at present such diverse opinions, we lose, in a measure, the co-operation of many good workers for the main cause.

Yours for solid organization, H. B. J.

READING, KAN., June 24, 1884.

"What do you want to be an Infidel for?"

"I don't want to be an Infidel. I would like to believe everything I read, hear, and see; or rather, I wish there might be nothing written, or said, or shown, that is not evidently to to my mind true, and then I could not be an Infidel."

"You are the strangest man I ever heard talk. What I mean is, why don't you believe there is a God, and in the Bible, and go to church and be respected like other folks?"

"My dear, it appears to me you are the strange one. I never said I did not believe in God."

"Well, what is the difference? You say you are an Infidel."

"My dear, there is a great difference. I will try to explain. Infidelity means simply non-belief in whatever alleged fact is presented to the mind. If you were to say, 'There is a God,' and I should say, 'I don't believe it,' I am an Infidel to that alleged fact. When you speak of me as an Infidel I admit it without defining in what regard, from the fact that the world has applied the word when not otherwise defined as meaning one who denies the Bible as being the word of God."

"Do you mean to tell me that you can believe in God and be what the world terms an Infidel?"

"Certainly I do."

"Well, the church folks and preachers and Sunday-school superintendents and all say that you and Bob Ingersoll and the Infidels don't believe in God, devil, or anything, except to argue and make fools of yourselvs, and I just want you to keep your mouth shut, so that the church folks and respectable people will call on us"

Mr. Editor, this much of a conversation was overheard this morning as it passed between man and wife, as she was arranging her toilet preparatory to parading the aisle of the Methodist church, of which she is a member. As she uttered the last words she slammed the door through which the words came to me, and I thought, "There is very little sense in what she has said, but how many hundreds of Infidels there must be who are placed similarly in their family relations by the egotistic, false teachings of the church and their studied efforts to impress upon their listeners the idea of degradation and shame to all who do not bow at the foot of the cross!" And I thought of the first question and what would be my answer if the speaker had been my own wife addressing me. Although the gentleman's answer was good and all true, the social relations existing with me are quite different. I am proud to say, in the first place, that my wife is too well read in English dictionary not to know the meaning of the word Infidel, and she knows exactly what I mean when I say I am an Infidel. And then, again, she knows me too well to ask any such foolish questions, so I cannot expect any such question from her, but if she or any other person should ask me why I am an Infidel, what would I answer? My first answer would be: "Well, I hav read and studied the alleged word of God and the evidences. I find these are not sufficient to satisfy me that they emanated from any other than imaginary and ambitious persons who perceived in nature and observations of the planets the same God which Infidels of to-day recognize, but are honest enough to say they know nothing of."

As a further answer to the question why I am an Infidel, I hate a hypocrit; I despise a man that cannot be what he is and say what he thinks, regardless of public opinion. I do not mean to say that all church-members are hypocrits, but I do mean to say that no preacher or teacher in any orthodox church knows what he is talking about, and consequently ought not to be tolerated as such; and if I should help to support them I am untrue to my belief, and consequently I would be a hypocrit. I despise a man that will join the church simply because he thinks it is to his financial interest to do so. If the church is right, go for it and support it like a man to the extent of your ability, and if it is wrong, stamp it out, as you value the future welfare of your children. If the Bible is true, support it; if it is a lie and a humbug, kill it. My advice to all is, "Search the scriptures." W. H. P.

ITHACA, N. Y., June 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: If you please, once more I introduce myself to your columns in the capacity of Freethinker. Freethought is independent of all outside influences whatever. It is not shackled with Bible histories or authors of any kind. It is inclosed in a world entirely its own. In a word, it is born of true liberty, and thinks for itself. It is not contaminated with books, papers, lectures, or sermons of any kind, but is a star of its own glory. Nature has formed it in a moral sense, with capacity to explore its own territory, with a view to the knowledge of all advance territory of other connecting worlds. First of all, primary knowledge begins at home; then all advance knowledge in Freethought step by step must be, not only in theory, but in practical proof. When we graduate in these first principles, our capacity expands, and we take in by the same rule of independent Freethought the knowledge of all the great variety of worlds outside of us, and behold the true connecting link in the great body of dual, animal, and moral nature, and whatever our membership may be in the body, it shall be to our glory. There are two general principles in nature which are, with others, fundamental; and those twain are cold and heat, light and darkness in the material world, and good and evil in the animal world. And these are the balancing poles. We cannot appreciate the one without the other. A contrast is inevitable, without which everything whatever would become monotonous, or sameness, and would yield no pleasure. Variety is a fundamental principle in our constitution. Then let us yield to everybody's theory of thought, which will feed good or evil, and keep up the contrast. And this is the very lesson to be learned. We all raise the standard of good (or pretend to), and repudiate the evil that is in us, and we use means to feed it in spite of ourselvs, though we pretend to reject it; yet it prevails. Look at the prevailing evil habits of mankind over the world in excessiv drinking, tobacco-using, and opium-eating. What great revolution is going to reform it? Prohibition can never prohibit. We must either by a general legislativ act cease to make it throughout the world, or prohibit children from its use, which is impossible, for it is hereditary or impregnated in their conception. Every sober person acknowledges the damnable evil, and often restrain themselvs to get rid of it, but cannot. The evil habit is an epidemic, and prevails through the world. And also lasciviousness, if possible a greater evil, prevails through the world. In taking a retrospectiv view of these great prevailing evils, Freethought is made to exclaim, What shall we do to be saved from ourselvs? Then to look into the political world, to behold the dishonesty, theft, and corruption of every kind prevailing in our law-making and legislativ halls, is sickening, and makes one think the balancing poles are unequal, and the greater percentage is on the side of evil. This brings to my mind as a side issue to this subject the familiar visits (referred to by Mr. Bennett in his travels at the East) by Melchizedec, the perpetual priest, who is said to be without beginning of days or end of life. The knowledge and efficacy of such sacrificial priest applies well here between good and evil. In all history evil seemed to be the prevailing power, for in every decade of the past, as far as we hav knowledge, the principle called evil has prevailed. It is said in the Bible that "I the Lord create good, and I create evil. I the Lord do all these things," meaning that it was needful and natural that there should be a contrast or a distinction, and to corroborate this, Jesus said it must needs be that evil or offenses come; so in every sense a necessity for good and evil is established. But the over-balancing of good with evil seemed to require a perpetual mediator or sacrificial priesthood to draw the line of balance, and satisfy good, and this must be the leading character of the future, or good will bolt and war will succeed. But whatever the result, Freethought will stand upon her dignity of individuality, secluded and safe in her own quiet world. She may be a spectator in the clash of worlds or sexual excesses, but she will sail over the prevailing flood of impurity, whose waters may cover the highest mountains of legislativ halls. In every phase of human affairs evil is feared and provided for by the perpetual office of sacrifice and the law of punishment. Freethought from her high standpoint of independence equalizes all these differences by accepting both good and evil as the undivided possessions of her territory. No amount of force can change nature, but Freethought must accept the situation, and good and evil will balance themselvs.

Yours truly, ZENOS KENT.

Children's Corner.

Cressbrook Cottage.

Now I am going to tell you about my visit to Cressbrook Cottage, on the New Boston road.

I did not go that way, however, to reach it, but took a nearer cut, through Oak Grove Cemetery, where the silent sleepers are scattered all about in that beautiful "city of the dead," and where we recently laid away our darling little Susie in all the beauty and loveliness of her fair young life. Pausing by the flower-covered mound, we thought of her sweet and gentle ways, recalled her affectionate little sayings, her loving eyes, and the pure expression of her face, while the hot tears fell upon the flowers above her resting-place. With a sigh, we went slowly on to the lower end of the cemetery, and through a gateway, thence down a lane that would hav delighted your eyes with its wealth of red and white clover, its little oceans of buttercups swaying and dancing in the breeze, pure white daisies, clustering wild roses, fragrant sweet-brier bushes, floods of elder blooms, dainty grasses, and feathery ferns, cuddling beside great "pudding stones," and mossy rocks, between which ran tiny streamlets, and little purling, babbling brooks, into which I saw leap, with a sudden plunge and splash, two great, green, long-legged frogs, as if afraid I had come to disturb their meditations on the rock.

Bluebirds trilled their flute-like notes overhead, while thrushes, robins, and other wild-wood birds welcomed me with sweet songs, or peeped down from their sheltered nests in the tall trees that shaded either side.

Yarrow, mullein, hardhack, and laurel, all in bloom, and budded golden rod, nodded and breathed perfume on me as I passed.

I must tell you a little anecdote about our common field mullein. An American lady in England was taken to see a rare plant brought from her nativ land, and regarded as a very choice specimen. They called it the "American velvet plant." When the lady looked at it she recognized at once its light yellow flower, stiff stalk, and broad leaf. An amused smile crept over her face, as she said in her straightforward Yankee style, "Good Lord! 'tis mullein!" adding, "Very good for sore throat."

Now and then a late dandelion peeped up, as if to tell how much it was in love with life and all its blessings.

Just around the corner of this flowery lane a few paces, and we were at the gate of "Cressbrook Cottage," to reach the threshold of which we passed up a box-bordered path, on either side of which bloomed gay flowers in artistic beds, from the central and larger of which arose a cunning little martin box.

Such geraniums, roses, honeysuckles, verbenas! Such evergreens, fruit-trees, and grape-vines, suggestiv of mellow pears and bunches of sweet grapes!

And I must not forget about the hens and chickens and the one duck, whose little homes are as guiltless of dirt as the garden is of weeds. A young and thrifty orchard promises fair fruitage by and by, and a kitchen garden whispers of new potatoes and green corn, with lots of lettuce and cucumbers long before the days begin to shorten.

The pretty white cottage is nestled down in the midst of all this beauty, like a jewel in a casket of emerald, away from the dusty street, in the midst of plenty of room, plenty of pure air, peace and plenty all around.

Inside that gem of a cozy cottage is the happy family. Aquariums, with water ferns and mosses growing cheerily in them, and awaiting the goldfish that are coming to inhabit them by and by. Overhead, mingled with baskets of flowers, bright-plumaged canaries trilled sweet songs, while in another room a sky-lark sat contented in his cage, seemingly not caring to soar aloft, as is the custom of the lark, who sings his sweetest songs when highest in the heavens. Like the prisoner of Chillon, this lark might say,

> "In quiet we hav learned to dwell;
> My very chains and I grew friends,
> So much a long communion tends
> To make us what we are."

Then there was a parrot, an African-gray parrot, with dark, mossy wings and red tail. You should hav heard him whistle, shriek, call the chickens, laugh, and gossip. He can say A and B, and with care might perhaps learn the whole alphabet, but I fear it would take a good many years to do it.

By and by some children came in, bright little girls and sturdy boys, and oh! they had such fun with the parrot! and such keen enjoyment romping in the fields and gathering great bouquets of daisies and other wild blossoms. I thought how pleased my little niece would hav been to hav formed one of their number. I wished, too, all you who will read this sketch could hav been present and enjoyed with me the scene; that you could hav seen the great cases of butterflies arranged like stars and flowers, and the case of birds, as well as the stuffed animals on the mantelpiece. What a good time you would hav had!

Mr. James Warburton, the owner of the cottage, is a spinner in a cotton mill. He is a nativ of England, and has always worked in a mill in the "old country," and in this.

How did he get such a pretty home? you ask. Well, I will tell you. He earned it by hard labor, honest labor. I remember only a few years ago the lot on which the cottage stands was but a boggy swamp. Mr. Warburton bought it, and people inquired if he was intending to build him a saw-mill.

"Never mind," he said. "You wait and see." Now, all the time he had to work was early in the morning, before sunrise, ere it was time to go to the mill, and after six at night, holidays, and, perhaps, Sundays, and whenever he could get an extra hour. Well, with a wheelbarrow he carted sand and dirt, and filled in the low, wet places, covered up the bogs, and made a high and dry lot; then he built Cressbrook Cottage, so-called from the brook below, where water-cresses grow.

All his life he has shunned strong drink, never tasting alcoholic stimulants. Sober, industrious, of steady habits, he has brought himself to this lovely pass—the ownership of a comfortable, handsome, happy home, which he never could hav had if he had spent all his earnings in alcoholic beverages. It is the drink, the beer, that is the secret of many a man's ill fortune, eating up his earnings, inflaming his blood, destroying the brain, paralyzing the intellect, and making the toiler, as well as the idler, a poor, miserable drudge and poverty-stricken dependent all his days.

Mrs. Warburton, the quiet, gentle wife and helpmate of James Warburton, possesses a romantic and interesting history. Her father was an officer in the British army, but she was early left an orphan, and was adopted by the regiment, which was stationed in the East Indies, where she lived all her early days. She has been in many parts of India, and also spent some time on the island of St. Helena. The gentleman in whose family she lived assisted in laying out the remains of the great Napoleon. Both Mrs. and Mr. Warburton are full of interesting reminiscences of other days, and it is pleasant to be in their beautiful home and to listen to their instructiv discourse.

I hav told you about Cressbrook Cottage that you may see what one man, and he in humble circumstances, may do. Not only has he, with the assistance of his wife, won this home of his, but he has not failed to improve his mind, and is well posted on past history as well as current topics. He takes an activ interest in all that is going on, is a devoted friend to the labor interests, and a bright, witty, and interesting correspondent of several newspapers.

You would hardly believe, to read his printed correspondence, and to hear him talk, that at nineteen years of age he could not read a word. Yet such was the case.

He is proud of his success in life, and justly so. He does not boast of "mansions not made with hands, eternal in the heavens," but he is very sure of Cressbrook Cottage and its pleasant surroundings, for it is unencumbered by debt or mortgage, and there is nothing shadowy or unreal about it.

We may learn a lesson of prudence, sobriety, industry, and thrift from this spinner in the mill. A favorit quotation of his is the following, which I hope you will remember and practice:

> "Since life forever will not last,
> Let us improve the passing hours,
> Correct the present by the past;
> The future may not long be ours."

Looking about that pleasant home, with its carpets, pictures, birds, and flowers, with its modern conveniences, we can but commend Mr. Warburton's course as worthy of imitation, and if generally followed there would be brighter, better times, and many happy homes with as sweet and attractiv surroundings as has vine-covered, rose-embowered Cressbrook Cottage."

The Dog's Appeal for Mercy.

Dear boys and girls who read the "Children's Corner," I wish, to-day, to speak a few words to you, through the kindness of Miss Wixon, about our good, faithful friend, the dog.

Nearly everywhere upon the earth where man is found, the dog is by his side to protect him and his goods from all harm.

Would you believe that men falsely called "scientific" (which properly means learned) could be found cruel and wicked enough to slowly torture and torment our dear, good friend, the dog, only to make their names famous, and to be considered by ignorant people (who know nothing of real science) to be great men? No, I am sure you would never believe it, yet it is true.

Now, just think how you would feel to hav your own dearly-loved dog, who eats every day from your hand, thus treated!

Below I will giv a little poem of my own, in which the faithful companion and friend of man appeals to you all to protect him from his cruel, remorseless enemies.

Dear children, when you grow up, please remember what the poor dog says (or would say, could he speak), and use all your influence to protect him from those wicked, heartless men.

THE DOG'S APPEAL FOR MERCY.

All-potent man! let not thy power
Abuse that trust we place in thee!
To guard thy life our own we giv,
And e'er thy faithful friend will be.

Oh, spare us from the cruel knife!
Let not the loving, kind, brown eyes
That gladdened when they met thine own,
Become a worthless, miscreant's prize!

We cannot speak, else should our prayer
To pity melt his stony heart
Who touches every spring of pain
Discovered by a hideous art!

What is our crime, that we must bleed,
The martyrs of a senseless cause?
Oh, is it thus they would repay
A love which every wrong ignores?

Ye are the lords of earth and sea,
And there is scarce one distant land
Where we are not, with watchful eye,
Found ever at thy side to stand!

Was ever, in recorded time,
One dog found faithless to a friend?
Then why for us thy bloody knife,
And pains which heart of fiends might rend?

Our mouths are dumb—we can but turn
True eyes to you in mute appeal,
Oh mercy! mercy! heartless man!
Know that our frames, like thine, can feel.

Oh, pity us who love thee well!
List to our dread, despairing cry!
Oh, spare us, ye who still be men!
Is there no friend—no succor nigh?

Yea! there doth swell a mighty shout
Which rolls in thunder through the land,
Uplifted by the foes of wrong—
A stern and swift-increasing band!

Yes, wronged dumb friends, our tireless arm
Shall rest not till thy latest foe
Doth sink to earth to rise no more,
And thou art free as winds that blow!

RIDDLE.

On fluttering wings I early rose,
In no exalted flight;
The lily in the shade that blows,
Not purer or more white.

At eve or morn 'twas pleasant sport
Adown the stream to glide;
I helped my mother to support,
And never left her side.
A reckless man, who sealed my doom,
Resolved a prize to win,
Dragged me remorseless from my home,
And stripped me to the skin.
He cropped my hair, that skin he flayed,
And then, his ends to seek,
He slit my tongue, because, he said,
He thus could make me speak.

'Twas done—my name and nature changed—
For love of hateful gold,
With many victims bound and ranged,
To slavery I was sold.

I'm slave to any man, or all,
Yet do not toil for pelf,
And though I'm ready at the call,
I cannot work myself.
Your tears and smiles I can excite,
Your inmost thoughts revealing,
Can giv you sorrow or delight,
And yet I hav no feeling.
Long persecutions I hav seen,
But this I must avow,
I think I never yet hav been
So badly used as now. —Old Almanac.

RICHARD'S CROWN

HOW HE WON AND WORE IT.

This is a book of 300 pages, embodying the most graphic, vivid, and thrilling portrayal of Society Life as it now exists.

The third edition of this remarkable book has just been issued by its author, Mrs. Anna D. Weaver. It is a story of thrilling interest, thoroughly dramatic, pathetic, fascinating, forcible, and graphic. What "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was to the slavery question, "Richard's Crown" is to the cause agitating the masses of the people of to-day.

The Bible Analyzed.

From the Davies Co. (Ind.) Democrat.

THE BIBLE ANALYZED. By John R. Kelso, A.M. 833 pp. Price $3.

This book is what its name indicates—an analysis of the Bible, and as such is as much superior to the only other work of the kind we hav ever seen, Hitchcock's "Analysis," as an unabridged dictionary is to a spelling book. It is a book that no Bible reader, and especially no student of the scriptures, should be without. It is written in plain, earnest, and easily understood language—clean English, and not burdened with words found only in late editions of the dictionaries. It is printed on clear paper and new type of a size and style plain to read, is well bound in good cloth, and is an ornament to the center table or library. The book contains a fine portrait of its author, who is a handsome, scholarly-looking man, yet one who has seen the dark side of life, as we learn from the preface to his book, in which he says:

"Being almost totally disabled by wounds received in the service of my country; being destitute of means; being often deprived of employment; and having a family of motherless and homeless children to support and educate on my limited earnings, my home while writing has been an old deserted warehouse; my seat an empty goods-box; my table a board propped up; my food has been often soda crackers or bread alone; my bed has been but little of anything, and my company has been the bats that hav kept up their monotonous circlings over my head. And yet, under circumstances apparently so hard, amid surroundings apparently so cheerless, my energies hav never flagged. I hav all the time been proud, independent, hopeful. I hav all the time felt that I was engaged in a good work, in a work that was to benefit my fellow-men long after my eyes are closed in eternal slumber."

Col. Kelso is an old soldier, having won distinction in the war of the Rebellion, and being a prominent member of the G. A. R. These facts, notwithstanding the merit of his book alone demands it, should insure for it an extensiv sale.

FALL RIVER, KAN., June 20, 1884.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav given the great work, "The Bible Analyzed," by the Hon. John R. Kelso, a careful perusal, and esteem it a very valuable addition to Liberal literature.

The work is analytical in character, not burdened with quotations and references from the writings of the ancients.

The chapter on Miracles is the most masterly effort I hav ever read on this subject. It really seems that a belief in such foolishness should end with the appearance of Kelso's book as darkness flees from the rising sun. The three chapters on Creation dispose of a large amount of orthodox nonsense. A personal God, worlds manufactured out of nothing, talking snakes, the bone foolishness, and other kindred topics are held up in the light of reason, common sense, and ridicule.

It is my privilege to be intimately acquainted with Col. Kelso; was with him when he first conceived the idea of writing "Deity Analyzed" and heard his first lecture on that subject. He is familiarly called Hon. John R. Kelso, having represented Missouri one term in Congress soon after the close of the Rebellion. We call him Col. Kelso because he was a colonel in the Union army, and commanded a detachment whose special business was to attend to the welfare of bushwhackers. We call him Professor Kelso because he is a distinguished educator and master of the languages. He has tasted the sweet and the bitter of life, from living feasted at the president's table in the White House, down to eating kernels of corn scratched out of the dirt where mules had previously been fed. He began life as a Methodist minister, but had too much largeness of heart to remain long in the "service of God." He never uses a pop-gun when a Dahlgreen is needed. Whatever he assails feels the blow of a sledge-hammer.

His touching yet modest allusion to himself in his preface is too true. Devoted to his work, with a heroic confidence in the great good he is rendering to his fellow-man, there is no sacrifice he would not make, and no privation he would not endure, to accomplish his object. The Liberal world, everywhere, cannot but welcome his work, "The Bible Analyzed," as a valuable addition in the great battle for Freethought.

What is Going On in the Churches.

THE DEVIL FISHING.

[The appended poem is deemed highly appropriate to this department.]

The devil sate by the river's side,
The stream of time, where you'll always find him;
Casting his line in the rushing tide,
And landing the fish on the bank behind him.

He sate at his ease in a cosey nook,
And was filling his basket very fast;
While you might hav seen that his deadly hook
Had a different bait on every cast.

He caught 'em as fast as a man could count;
Little or big, it was all the same;
One bait was a check for a large amount,
An assemblyman nabbed it, and out he came!

He took a gem that as Saturn shone;
It sank in the water without a sound,
And caught a woman who long was known
As the best and purest for miles around.

Sometimes he'd laugh, and sometimes he'd sing,
For better luck no one could wish;
And he seemed to know for a dead sure thing
The bait best suited to every fish.

Quoth Satan: "The fishing is rare and fine!"
Then he took a drink—somewhat enthused;
But yet a parson swam round the line,
And e'en the most tempting baits refused.

He tried him with gold, and with flashing gems,
Hung fame and fortune upon the line;
Dressing gowns with embroidered hems,
But still the dominie made no sign!

A woman's garter went on the hook;
"I hav him at last," quoth the devil, brightening;
And Satan's sides with laughter shook
As he landed the preacher as quick as lightning!

THE PETULANT POP OF THE PISTOL.

At 7 o'clock on the evening of June 7th, Samuel Armstrong, of Dallas, Texas, was shot and killed by the Rev. Olin Mumsford, Baptist. The murderer was captured and locked up. The dispute between the two gentlemen was as to which was a thief.

A THOROUGHLY BAD MAN.

A church quarrel at Sebastopol, Col., has unearthed incidents in the career of the Rev. J. C. Crisman, Presbyterian, that are unfit for publication. He has, if reports are true, committed nearly all the crimes prohibited by the decalog, and beat his alleged wife besides.

THOU SHALT NOT STEAL

The Rev. Thomas H. Smith, of Baltimore, Md., is 72 years old, and for many years preached Christ and him crucified. For seven years he was deacon in the Christian church of Baltimore. Recently he stole money from the contribution basket. The church authorities expelled him.

THE LARCENY OF A HEART.

A wealthy old citizen of Marion township, Ohio, has brought suit against Rev. J. H. Ralsey for $5,000 damages, sustained by reason of the reverend gentleman's having alienated the affections of and led astray the young and handsome wife of his venerable parishioner. The developments in the trial were highly sensational.

PREACHED RELIGION, BUT STOLE.

J. H. Cole has been arrested at Bowling Green, Kentucky, for robbery. He said he was the agent of Fairbanks, Palmer & Co., book dealers, of Chicago. He exhorted the the prisoners in the county jail on Sunday, and when Cole was arrested some of the stolen property was found in his possession.

THROWN BACK UPON A LONG-SUFFERING WORLD.

The Rev. A. F. Vedder, now in state prison serving a sentence for adultery, and abetting criminal malpractice in the case of Miss Walter, has, through counsel, had an ecclesiastical trial before the Presbytery of Albany, N. Y. The result was that the Presbytery deposed the defendant from the ministry and excommunicated him from the church.

THE CLASH OF RESOUNDING ARMS.

"I hav a breech-loading, double-barreled shotgun and a pistol at the parsonage, and I intend to defend myself if I am attacked. You can count on that." Such was the language of boycotted Parson Washington, of Morris Brown church in Charleston, S. C., when told that his rebellious flock would probably move upon the parsonage. The leaders of both factions in the African Methodist rebellion are getting bloodthirsty and slinging mud at a terrible rate. The church is represented by Presiding Elder Jefferson and the Rev. Samuel Washington, and the rebels by the Revs. J. E. Hayne and W. E. Johnson. Both of the rebel preachers hav been deposed by Bishop Dickerson for conduct unbecoming ministers. Johnson is accused of disobedience to lawful authority. He has gone to two of the Sea Islands to strengthen the backbone of the congregations there that hav joined in the insurrection. The boycotted parson of Morris Brown church applied in the Superior Court for a mandamus to compel his congregation to reinstate him.

A CITIZEN COERCED BY A PRIEST WITH A SHOTGUN.

The Rev. Thomas O'Flaherty, the deposed and eccentric priest of Auburn, N. Y., who now lives in seclusion in the town of Sennett, Cayuga county, was arrested in Auburn on a charge of assaulting his neighbor, Earl Gurnee, with a deadly weapon. Gurnee asserts that one night last week O'Flaherty came on his premises with a shotgun, which he pointed at him, and compelled him at its muzzle to march over to the ex-priest's house, where he was detained and threatened for about two hours.

THE CAPTAIN OF THE HOST GOES WRONG.

Captain Merey Little, of the Muskegon, Mich., division of the Salvation Army, failed to return to her boarding-house the other night, which greatly excited her comrades, they reporting her as probably abducted to the chief of police next morning. Later it was discovered that she had spent the night in the office of a shyster real estate and insurance agent. At the court-marial Friday night she made no denial, saying simply that she was sorry. She is a very pretty but very ignorant English girl of about eighteen years. The army is not so noisy since the captain's fall

Y. V. T.

IN IMITATION OF ABRAHAM.

A boy named Andy Adams, at North Creek, near Wheeling, W. Va., who became insane on the subject of religion, has murdered his mother and an eight-year-old sister. The boy has been arrested, and the series of religious meetings which he attended has been stopped. The neighbors called at the house and made a horrible discovery. The mother and daughter were both dead. The former had her head mashed, and the latter's throat was cut from ear to ear. The boy was found crouched in a corner. In reply to questions he said the Lord had told him to offer his mother and sister as a sacrifice, and the Lord would bring them to life again. The cabin presented a ghastly appearance. Blood was everywhere. The mother was killed with an ax, and the sister's throat was cut with a butcher knife.

A MAN MAY PRAY AND PRAY, AND BE A VILLAIN STILL.

Mrs. Noble, a wealthy widow, and mother of a handsome daughter, living at Quaker City, Ohio, married John Evans, a singing teacher, about a year and a half ago. Not much was known of Evans previous to his coming there, but he became a leading church-member. Four months ago the daughter left home, as she said she did not want to be dependent. The family opposed the arrangement, but she entered the family of a farmer near Zanesville. Six weeks ago she came home much emaciated in appearance. The doctor said she had had a fever. There were ugly rumors about her and Evans, but as he stood high they were little heeded. The girl soon died. A few minutes before her death she tried to say something about Evans, but was not understood. Evans stayed in town and appeared so devout that the matter was soon forgotten. On Sunday the mother found a letter written by the daughter, in which she charged Evans and the doctor, who said she had a fever, with a criminal offense. Evans was burnt in effigy, and ordered to leave within three days, under pain of death, which he did. Where he went is not yet known. The doctor has been arrested.

ANOTHER PASTOR TAKES THE BROAD ROAD.

The community of Westover, in the township of Beverly, Ont., is greatly excited over the departure of Rev. J. D. McColl, who had been for a couple of years pastor of the Baptist church there. The organist of the church was a Miss Shaver, whose parents are respectable people living near McColl's house. The organist and the minister were naturally thrown much into each other's company, but no evil was suspected. Some time ago Mrs. McColl fell sick, and at the earnest request of the minister Miss Shaver went to his house to assist in the care of the children. When Mrs. McColl recovered she found a package of addressed envelopes and some medicin which excited her suspicion. These she took to Mrs. Shaver, and the result was that McColl was accused of undue intimacy with the young woman. He denied it on his honor, and assured his wife and the girl's mother that their suspicions were unjust and unfounded. His wife was not convinced, but nothing was done for a short time until the clergyman announced that he was going away. He sold property and some goods belonging to his wife as well, but she received none of the money. Then he took his wife and seven children to her father's home in Bothwell. Returning to Westover he preached his farewell sermon, and went off to the states. He settled at Dover, Ill., and as far as is known he is there yet. From Dover he wrote to Miss Shaver, inclosing her money for expenses, and she followed him. The infatuated girl walked from Westover to the Brock road, and took the stage to Dundas. Her sisters wrote to McColl, reproaching him with his infamous conduct. He had the audacity to reply that he had done all for the best, and that the love between himself and the unfortunate woman who followed him was unconquerable. The chances are that he will desert her in a short time as he did his wife. He says he proposes to go on with his work in the ministry.

AN INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF A MINISTER.

The Rev. Dr. Merkle, who, by the grace of God and John Kelly, holds the office of coroner, was so wroth one day recently that he swore like the army in Flanders. He livs at No. 422 East Fifty-first street, and was just sitting down to his first repast, when a cart drove up and a policeman summoned him to look at the body of a man who appeared to be a 'longshoreman, and who was found in the East River at Forty-seventh street. The Rev. Dr. Merkle stifled his disgust and curtly told the officer that his home was not the morgue. Soon after another cart brought to the house the body of Edward Binder, who shot himself in Central Park. This time the Rev. Dr. Merkle vented his anger so that the air was blue, and the bystanders were aghast at the scope of the reverend gentleman's vocabulary. In the afternoon the Rev. Dr. Merkle expressed himself forcibly and freely in regard to the matter. "Eets a tam shame," he exclaimed, "and ze polees should no petter. Shust thunk, my house meestaken for ze morgue. Cot tam eet, eesent eet a shame to preeng poddees to a man's house in ze morning? Meester Vite, pleez do and find owit who vas dat poleezman. I vant no more brozeeshuns of poddees to mein house." Keeper White promised to find "owit."

A DOCTOR OF SEVERAL DIVINITIES.

From a Western paper the following incidents in the career of a man of God are learned of: San Jose, Cal., has a first-class sensation. A minister who sailed under the holy-sounding title of the Rev. B. S, Gardner, D.D., about two weeks ago had his lustful regard excited for a girl of fourteen while he was in the act of administering to her the ordinance of baptism. Soon afterward he set about accomplishing her ruin, and succeeded by persuading the girl that there was no harm in her yielding to the desires of "a man of God."

The lecherous impostor would stand up in the pulpit and preach the love of Christ while the victim of his lust sat in the audience. The Times of that city says of him: "On Sunday, the 8th inst., he was dismissed from the congregation as an unworthy member. Three weeks ago he made over all his property to his wife, fearing probably that a suit for seduction might be brought against him. He is charged with crimes the nature of which stamp him as a scoundrel of the deepest dye. While officiating as a minister of the gospel he seduced several young girls, whose names are withheld from publication for reasons that all appreciate. Taking advantage of their tender years, and of their faith and trust in him as an expounder of the gospel and a teacher of moral truths, he deliberately wrought their ruin. That he has been permitted to remain in the city after such actions is a mystery to us. That he will leave after this publication may be taken for granted."

BLACK BUT COMELY, AND ALSO VERY IMMORAL.

The Rev. H. Davis, formerly pastor of the African Methodist Church at Elmira, N. Y., was expelled lately by the unanimous vote of the New York Conference, in session at the Bridge Street Church, Brooklyn. The charge against the pastor is immorality. Pastor Davis is represented as one of the handsomest men of his race, and well calculated to inspire the giddy members of his flock with admiration. He went to Elmira two years ago with his wife and family. His presence created a sensation among the female members of his flock. They feted and flattered him, and the apparent pleasure their attentions gave him excited the attentions of the older members of the congregation. Mrs. Johnson, the pretty wife of Barber Johnson, appeared perfectly infatuated with Pastor Davis, and he appeared to return her affection.

Their conduct excited suspicion, and about six months ago a scandalous discovery was made. Johnson told his wife that he was going to New York on a Saturday night to be absent until Monday. As soon as he had taken his departure, Mrs. Johnson, it is charged, sent a letter to the pastor. After Sunday morning's service Pastor Davis informed his wife that he had a pulpit to "supply" in the country, and upon leaving her he went directly to Johnson's house, and spent the afternoon with Mrs. Johnson. He even overslept himself, and did not get to the church in the evening service at all. The congregation gathered, but were told by Mrs. Davis that her husband had gone to the country, and they were just about separating when Johnson suddenly appeared on the scene. He was greatly excited, and his face was of an ashen hue. Calling Deacon James, Elder Jackson, and other officials aside, he communicated to them the fact that the pastor had been at his house and not in the country at all. The elders were horror-stricken, and it was determined to hav the pastor who had so disgraced himself expelled.

The case was discussed at great length in the conference. Pastor Goodey suggested that Davis be suspended for three months.

Pastor Dardis moved as an amendment that Pastor Davis be suspended for six months.

Rev. Horace Talbot moved as a substitute that he be expelled. "He has been guilty of grave offenses," said the indignant pastor, "and ought to be punished to the full extent of the law." His motion was put and unanimously carried.

CONFESSION FOR THE GOOD OF THE SOUL.

There hav been some remarkable developments in connection with the wholly unexpected retirement from the pulpit of the Rev. Jonathan H. Dally, late pastor of Trinity Methodist Episcopal church, Jersey City. He is a young married man, and became the pastor of Trinity church in March last, for three years previous to which time he was pastor of the Market Street church in Paterson. His appointment to Trinity church was made by the Newark Conference at the earnest request of the leading members of the congregation. Being an eloquent speaker and of pleasing manners, he soon became a general favorit in Jersey City, and under his ministrations the church membership rapidly increased.

Recently, without notifying any of the officers of the church, Mr. Daily absented himself from his pulpit, and upon investigation it was learned that he and his wife had gone to Woodbridge, N. J., on the previous day. Neither Mr. Dally nor his wife has been in Jersey City since, and it was stated by one of the officers of the church that the pastor had retired in disgrace from the pulpit, and that his resignation was in the hands of the presiding elder. It was also learned that Mr. Dally had made to the presiding elder a confession admitting a criminal intimacy with a woman known as Annie Stewart. This woman, it is said, while Mr. Dally was pastor of the Market Street church, applied for admission to the parsonage one evening, saying that she was ill and without friends. Mr. Dally admitted her to his house. In a short time she recovered, and an intimacy then sprang up between her and the pastor. The woman then revealed to Mrs. Dally the story of her husband's downfall. Taxed with his fault by his wife, Mr. Dally confessed all to her, begged forgivness, and was pardoned. The woman then threatened to expose all if she was ejected from the house, and a horrible existence began for the preacher and his wife. The burden became so terrible that Mr. Dally was frequently tempted to call in his brethren and confess everything. In the mean time, Mr. and Mrs. Dally made every effort to rid themselvs of the woman's presence. In vain they tried to get her places to liv. It became plain that she did not intend easily to lose her hold upon the minister, and he turned her out of the house.

She then swore out a warrant for his arrest on a charge of infidelity, and learning of this the disgraced pastor fled, and the woman has also disappeared from Jersey City.

A PENITENT PREPARED FOR CONFIRMATION.

The following is translated from the Swedish paper Svinska Folkets Allehanda, published at Litchfield, Minn.:

"Scarcely had the public's excited feelings, caused by the crime against morality which not long ago was committed within the Minnesota Conference, been stilled, before again within the same conference an even more abominable crime was committed by one of its pastors. A rumor of this has a longer time been around in circles where events of this kind generally are discussed and judged before the public get a clear insight into them. We also hav long had a partial knowledge of the alleged deed, but hav been unwilling to lay it before our readers until sure facts in regard to the same had been gathered. Now the veil has fallen, and the crime stalks forth in all its horrible nakedness. Hemlandet, the church's own organ, has this time declared it roundly, and with few but sharp words scourged not only the crime now committed but also other abuses within the church. Meanwhile, were it not our duty as publishers to impartially communicate to our readers events of more prominent weight both within the state and church's dominions, we would rather hav left the designated priest-scandal untouched, and this partly because we come somewhat post festum with it, and partly because it is not unknown to us how recklessly one or another of the 'synod's' organs proceed against those who in one way or another hav happened to step on their tender corns. Yet we cannot but herein see a remarkable Nemesis divina, as we believe that we hav found that more than once the Augustana synod has seen the mote in the brother's eye, but has been unwilling or unable to discover the beam in its own. But now to the matter in question. N. G. Dahlstedt, pastor of the Augustana congregation of Carver, East Union, and Jordan, and secretary of the Minnesota conference, was intrusted with the momentous and responsible calling to prepare the scarcely sixteen-year-old girl, H. Qvarnstroem, of Jordan, for her first communion. It is understood that the girl was not well enough grounded in the Swedish language, for which reason the pastor, to be enabled to impart to her the needed knowledge of Christianism, took her home separately, for the purpose of by these means to get her prepared for confirmation with the other children. But during this the pastor's desire for unchastity so wholly overpowered the soul organ that he committed crime against morality with his own penitent. Dahlstedt has himself confessed his crime, and after due investigation was expelled from the ministry."

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

TESTIMONIALS:

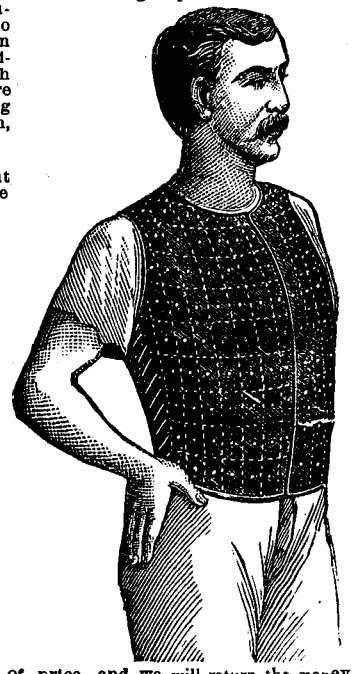
Read the following testimonials, and be convinced our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.



Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

Gems of Thought.

IN no country and of no country hav greater misrepresentations been made, in none hav high hopes been more thoroughly disappointed, and in none hav more arrant falsehoods been told; in the matter of falsehoods, past and present, Palestine beats the world. A fragment of the religion of the latter country, but founded upon its errors and containing much of its untruth, has been imported and adopted by other nations; and being comparativly fresh and new it still exhibits considerable life; but as whatever is based upon error cannot endure, so this paganism engrafted upon Jewish stock is bound to follow in the wake of its predecessors, to go into ruins and be counted among the relics of the past.—D. M. Bennett.

"IF it is not true I do not want to know it," is an expression on the lips of hundreds, and, I am sorry to say it, these lips are generally those of women. Men want to know; men dig deep, soar high, and fly far. Women sit at home, float on the surface, and are content to believe instead of knowing. This is why man keeps the upper hand and retains the ruling power. Knowledge is power. Let woman once resolve that she will hav the truth, let it be what it may, that she will know, and not simply believe, and she will find such a deep, pure joy in the blessed experience of real knowledge that she will no longer be content to remain in child-like ignorance, satisfied to swallow any fable or fiction, so long as man tells her to, but she will cling fast to truth and follow where it leads, till she is owner of herself and is a perfect independent, self-supporting individual—the real half of man—his equal and counselor—his guide and friend—the same as he is hers. Then, and only then, will our great and glorious land of liberty and equality deserve its name; and then, and only then, will this name be a real and actual truth. —Elmina D. Slenker.

ALAS! for Maiden; alas! for Judge,
For rich repiner and household drudge!

God pity them both! and pity us all,
Who vainly the dreams of youth recall.

For of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these: "It might hav been!"
—Whittier's Maud Muller.

I HAV read of a king of Spain who, having inadvertently expressed some compassion for one of the victims at an auto da fe, was condemned to lose one quart of his blood, which the inquisitor-general insisted should be publicly burnt by the hands of the common hangman in the great square of Madrid. Here we know not which most to despise, the monarch that could submit to such a sentence, or the proud priest that could pronounce it. The most galling of all fetters, those riveted by superstition, well befitted the people that could tamely behold such an insult offered to their king.—Colton's Lacon.

NO man will hinder thee from living according to the reason of thy nature; nothing will happen to thee contrary to the reason of the universal nature. . . . What kind of people are there whom men wish to please, and for what objects and by what kind of acts? How soon will time cover all things, and how many has it covered already!—M. A. Antoninus.

IT is at least a right and wise feeling for the young to cultivate—that there is no form of honest work which is really beneath them. It may or may not be suitable for them. It may or may not be the species of work to which they hav any call. But let them not despise it. The grocer is equally honorable with the lawyer; the tailor with the soldier. It is just as really becoming a gentleman—if we could purge our minds of traditional delusions which will not stand a moment's impartial examination—to serve behind a counter as to sit at a desk, to pursue a handicraft as to indite a law-paper, or write an article. The only work that is more honorable is work of higher skill and more meritorious excellence. It is the qualities of the workman, and not the name or nature of the work, that is the source of all real honor and respect.—How to Succeed in Life, by Principal Tulloch.

Odds and Ends.

"SPEAKING of the sagacity of animals," said Mr. Marrowfat, "I never knew that our dog Bruno had much intelligence until last Sunday, when he followed us to church and slipped unobserved into the pew." "I should rather accept that as an evidence of his piety," interrupted the visitor. "What proof did he giv of his sagacity?" "Why, he slept during the whole sermon."

RULES OF COURTSHIP.

The manly youth who would a maiden woo
Will profit if he keeps these rules in view:
Be not precipitate nor yet too slow;
Be not abashed at a rebuff or so.
If she is unresponsiv, distant, cold,
The wooer should be delicately bold;
If she is timid, diffident, and shy,
Don't fret, she'll find more courge by and by.
Let not her first refusal giv distress;
A woman's no is often meant for yes.

A PRETTY Boston schoolma'am and a youth of mien sedate Were parting in the evening beside the garden gate; His hand and heart he'd offered her, in a grave and sober way, And she, with quiet dignity, had named the happy day; He lingered at the gate with her, and said, in accents low, "There is a little favor I would ask before I go, A favor never asked before; sweet maiden, it is this, A lover's privilege, that is all, a sweet betrothal kiss." "If you'll wait," the maiden whispered, with her color rising high, Till I remove my spectacles, I'll willingly comply."

MARJORIE'S KISSES.

Marjorie laughs and climbs on my knee,
And I kiss her, and she kisses me.
I kiss her, but I don't much care,
Because, although she is charming and fair,
Marjorie's only three.

But there will come a time, I ween,
When, if I tell her of this little scene,
She will smile and prettily blush, and then
I shall long in vain to kiss her again,
When Marjorie's seventeen.

A SUMMER IDYL.

NOw shy
\nd bashful lovers sit upon the stoop
And sweetly spoon,
N hile downward summer's first musketos swoop
With weird, low tune,
And high
d higher up the sapphire skies
She climbs the moon,
d eyes look love to loving eyes,
And sigh greets sigh.

The frog
A nocturne warbles to his listening mate
In accents low,
The youth perceives the hour is growing late,
And he must go,
Yes, jog.
He kisses her a wild good-bye;
Meanwhile, oh, woe!
rate pa, with angry eye,
Lets loose the dog.

Few moons
'er gazed upon so harrowing a sight
With smiling face;
A youth, wild yelling, flying with affright,
A dog in chase,
Still croons
The frog within the sedgy pool,
While from the race
The dog returns with mouth crammed full
Of pantaloons.

PICKED UP ON THE COLLEGE CAMPUS.

To-day! We stand on the threshold! We stand there! Waiting! To be asked in. Life! Is a river! We meet it boldly. Hope, courage, and high purpose thrill our hearts! We cannot tear aside the veil that hides the future from our view. The future! Is before us. The past! Is behind us! The present, however, stays right by us. We do not fear it. We press bravely on. Onward and upward! The hour strikes the noontide of the world. With resolute hand we grasp the shadows on the dial. Behind us is the school. A long way behind us, the most of it. Before us lies the world. We accept it. Grave are the responsibilities of the trust. Lifelong will be the labor of reform. We hav put our hands to the plow, and we will never look back until we get to Canada. As the years roll on—which they will probably do—we will never forget our alma mater; but we will shake things up on the street ourselvs, and if there is any re-hypothecating to be done, inquire within. Hoc tempore, the world is in bad form. Vice rules the world. Bonos vires take back seats in the convention. Lupus sits in the high places and judges the people in the gates, while Agnus ekes out a precarious existence in the wool business. Our rulers wallow in vice. The temples of commerce are as dens of thieves. Mistrust, guilt, and suspicion stalk through the land, nudus membra. All this has come to pass while we were at college. But we will reform all this sort of thing now. Not this week, because this week the gods look down from high Olympus to see the boat-race. Next week the world holds its breath while our baseball match is played; and the week after that the sun stands still upon Gibeon, and the moon in the Valley of Ajalon, while we play the closing game of lawn-tennis for the championship. But after that we will mount our bicycles and go forth conquering and to conquer. Life! Is an ocean! Let us, then, cleanse its Augean stables of this blighting leprosy, and beard this lion in the bud, and, in the gathering gloom which marks the footprints of decay, throttle it in its cradle ere yet its black wings shall strike its fangs deep into the soil of American freedom, and with a Judas kiss betray our fondest hopes and brightest dreams into the sand-swept waste of this sirocco-stricken maelstrom that yawns at our feet, waiting for some self-sacrificing Curtius to lay the ax at the root of this deadly Upas-tree that shadows all the land with the lurid light of its basilisk eye, which, syren-like, charms with its delusiv song, only to chill into pulseless stone with the Gorgon horror of its icy blast!—Robert J. Burdette, in Brooklyn Eagle.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted we won't ask you to continue with us any longer

"The Sons and Daughters of the Order of St. Luke" is a colored organization in St. Louis. The members believe St. Luke was black.

Bibles are no longer to be found in watering-place hotel parlors and bed chambers. Formerly the Bible was as much a part of the furniture as the match-safe.

What many consider the most valuable relic in Italy is the sword Balaam wished he had had in his hand when the ass spoke. It is the glory of a convent at Albano.

Every Other Saturday quotes the late Thomas G. Appleton as describing a conveyancer as a "seraph gone to seed." A few days since a Boston pastor, speaking of a confrere, alluded to him as "a dear old moth-eaten angel."

The Home Protector tells the story that one of Philadelphia's most popular "pastors" gave his Sabbath-school a picnic recently, "the most conspicuous feature of which was the permitting of large numbers of young girls to smoke cigars."

The Christian Register admits that as "men build houses as they build creeds and institutions, that they may hav a settled home; but there is nothing in this world that can prevent mutation, and sooner or later the sign-board appears, 'For Sale or to Let,' so this is the sign-board which orthodoxy is putting up on some of its old dogmas, and the former tenants hav moved to better quarters."

Monte Carlo, with its infamous gambling-hells, which are reported to hav caused thirty-two cases of suicide already this season, is correspondingly orthodox in its piety. Rome is supreme, and no Protestant is allowed to distribute tracts or Bibles, or to open a church. Piety is the readiest means of making vice respectable. Worship God and obey the church, and it doesn't matter if you do ruin your fellow-man and drive him into a suicide's grave.

Ten years ago a penniless man, with a peculiarly shaped head, made a bargain with a London professor of anatomy by which the latter was to hav the head on payment of the man's funeral expenses. Meanwhile the man became wealthy, and when he died the other day his friends tried to avoid fulfilling the contract. But the professor insisted, and the matter is to be brought before the law courts. Pending the decision, the defunct gentleman has been buried with his head on his shoulders.

A dispatch from Richmond, Mo., of July 10th, says: "Joseph Smith, a son of the founder of the Mormon church; Alexander Smith, T. W. Smith, and W. H. Kelly, the committee appointed by the Mormon conference at Salt Lake, are now in that place comparing the 'Book of Mormon,' as at present published, with the original manuscript in the possession of David Whitmer, of Richmond. Mr. Whitmer claims to be one of three persons who saw an angel giv graven plates to Joseph Smith, and this manuscript is a copy of the plates made by the prophet himself, and is the only one in existence. Why the comparison is made is not stated." Well, we don't see why the Mormons hav not as good right to revise their Bible as the Christians hav to rewrite theirs.

This good old story is going the rounds again: Mary was a buxom country lass, and her father was an upright deacon in the Methodist church in a Connecticut village. Mary's plan of joining the boys and girls in a nutting party was frustrated by the unexpected arrival of a number of the "brethren" on their way to the conference, and Mary had to stay at home and get dinner for the clerical guests of her father. Her already ruffled temper was increased by the reverend visitors themselvs, who sat about the stove and in the way. One of the good ministers noticed her wrathful impatience, and desiring to rebuke the sinful manifestations, said sternly, "Mary, what do you really think will be your occupation in hell?" "Pretty much the same as it is on this earth," she replied, "cooking for Methodist ministers."

The Christian at Work remarks that "in England, where the beer shops are opened on Sunday evening, it is found that the game of cricket has weaned many young men from their temptations;" and admits that in this country "a boy who is playing ball is at least honestly employed." In the light of these facts, however, the Christian at Work thinks the Sabbath should not be broken by ball playing. If Sabbath-keeping is more desirable than temperance and healthful exercise, that paper may be right; otherwise, not.

"You swear positivly that it was on Sunday morning that you heard the woman shout for help?" "Yes, your honor, positivly." "This affair occurred some months ago. Couldn't it hav been Saturday morning, or Monday morning, instead of Sunday morning?" "Impossible, your honor." "But why?" insisted the judge. "Man's memory is not infallible. Why are you so positiv that it was Sunday morning?" "Because when I first heard the cry for help I was out in the back-yard digging angle-worms."

"What is that invisible power," asked an Austin Sunday-school teacher, "that prevents the wicked man from sleeping, that causes him to toss about on his pillow, and what should he do to enjoy that peace that passes all understanding?" "Go to the drug-store and buy some insect powder. Ma sent me for a dime's worth last Wednesday, and we havn't felt—" Johnny Spilkins would hav gone into particulars as to the further workings of the "invisible power," if his sister, who is a little older, and has ten times as much sense, hadn't pulled him down.

The Unitarian Association is petitioning the queen against the Athanasian Creed. They don't like to be told thirteen times a year that without doubt they shall perish everlastingly. They resent this official "insult" as a great offense against their religious feelings. Poor things, and do they feel a religious insult so keenly? Yet they hadn't the pluck the other day to support Mr. Geldart's resolution against the wicked blasphemy laws. Freethinkers may suffer twelve months' solitary confinement; but poor dear Unitarians mustn't hav their feelings hurt by religious rubbish uttered in churches that they don't attend.—London Freethinker.

About a year and a half ago the Rev. Father Tiernan died while assistant pastor of St. Cecilia's Roman Catholic church, Brooklyn. The pastor was the Rev. Florence McCarthy, who was in the courts a short time ago for criminally assaulting a servant girl. An executor for Father Tiernan's estate was appointed by Bishop Loughlin, but no executor was appointed by the surrogate. Mrs. Mary Smith, a niece of Father Tiernan, believes that the priest left some thousands of dollars, and she has commenced an action for an accounting against the executor, who, it is supposed, has either diverted the property to his own use, or turned it over to the church.

It must go on record to the credit of the Christian press that there is one religious humbug which it refuses to unanimously indorse. This is what is popularly known as the "faith cure." Says the American Literary Churchman: "The Rev. Mr. Sloan, who was obliged to retire from his parish, Christ Church, Stratford, Conn., presumably on the ground of what most sensible people would consider a monomania, has set up a 'Faith Mission' in the same place. This seems to be a schismatic organization for the purpose of curing disease without medicin or surgery by 'faith' or prayer. It is idle to discuss this kind of nonsense. If anything in the world could make religion justly contemptible, it would be the establishment in connection with every parish of a 'faith mission.' Cannot Mr. Sloan bring the whole matter to a successful issue, not by practicing on the susceptibilities of nervous and hysterical invalids, but by restoring by prayer and faith a lost leg? Everybody can see with his own eyes whether a man has one leg or two; he could also see the new leg growing and grown. We are free to say that we regard the whole business as a disgusting parody of the Christian religion."

The announcement has been made to the congregation worshiping in St. Peter's Cathedral, in Cincinnati, Ohio, that marriages will hereafter be solemnized only in the morning. This rule has been adopted by Archbishop Elder for the reason that it is more Catholic for marriages to occur during the morning hours, and that the custom of afternoon and evening weddings is one which fashion has dictated, and it divests the ceremony of much of its sacredness. As a consequence, it is held, the vows are often lightly taken, and divorces hav multiplied. Before proceeding further it would be well for the archbishop to consult those contemplating marriage as to what time in the day they would prefer to hav the ceremony performed. A marriage that will not hold if done in the evening is not of much account anyway.

The acknowledgment of the injustice suffered by woman under the existing condition of things in Norway is slowly but surely gaining ground in the public mind of that country. Some two years ago the legislature, after considerable opposition, passed a law placing women on equal terms with men in regard to admission to studies at the public university of Christiania, from which they had until then been excluded In the same year the first female student entered the university. As an unavoidable consequence the Odelsthing lately passed a law granting women the right to graduate from the university, most characteristically the only one member opposing that bill being a minister of the established church. Another step which may lead in the direction of the emancipation of women was recently taken by the same legislature. The government spends every year thousands upon thousands of dollars on public schools for boys, but hitherto not one single cent has been appropriated for schools for girls, those schools having been left entirely to take care of themselvs, or to the care of the communities. In order to test the system of joint education for boys and girls, the legislature appropriated some hundred dollars a year for a public school in some little town on the condition that the joint education system should be adopted. Insignificant as this appropriation may appear, still, if this system proves itself to work well, it is likely to be generally adopted, and then at last the future women of the country will get their share of the public education, and thus be enabled to do their share of the public work.

William Rossiter, in the Nineteenth Century, debates the Sunday question as follows: "Why is it desired to open public institutions on Sunday? 1. Because there are many people who cannot go on other days, but who could and would go on Sundays. 2. Because it is good for people to visit such institutions at any time, even on Sunday. 3. Because, being national property, the people (who are the owners) should be able to enter at any time they desire to do so in any number. 4. Because it is self-evident that people who work long hours on week-days (and there are many who do so) cannot go at all except on Sunday. This is especially true of shopkeepers, assistants, and laborers." Mr. Rossiter adds: "Why is it desired to keep them closed on Sundays? Because to open them deprives, or would deprive, many of their day of rest, since the attendants, etc., would hav to work. But many do work on Sunday in church, chapel, Sunday-school; and perhaps no work in the world is more useless than that of ringing a church bell for an hour or more every Sunday in a town where everyone has abundant means of knowing the time. Domestic servants work nearly as much on Sunday as on other days. Policemen and soldiers are employed by the public. So that it is not Sunday work, but needless Sunday work; not Sunday work that is, but Sunday work that might be, that is objected to. But since it is right to employ policemen to protect property and preserve order, it might be as well to employ museum assistants in the work of education, which tends to remove the need of policemen." This argument was old before Mr. Rossiter thought of it, but he will now hav an opportunity to realize how little argument is worth to those who never reason.

News of the Week.

The 12th inst. was Orangemen's Day. A procession at Cleaton, Ireland, provoked a riot. A Catholic was shot by an Orangeman.

Anarchist Hanisch, of Vienna, has been sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. He is charged with having attempted the life of a policeman.

Benjamin P. Shillaber, the humorous writer under the name of "Mrs. Partington," celebrated his 70th birthday at Chelsea, Mass., on the 12th.

France has made certain propositions to China, and unless they are accepted immediately the French will open fire on the forts at Shanghai, China.

The dynamiters of this city hav declared for Blaine. The Independent Republicans of Philadelphia hav also given in and will vote for the Plumed Knight.

The cholera epidemic at Marseilles and Toulon, France, has not abated. Last Sunday there were nearly one hundred deaths from the disease in those cities.

The police of Newark, N. J., believe that they hav caught the man guilty of the Phœbe Paullin murder committed at Orange last November. His name is Davis.

Somebody is reported to hav attempted the blowing up of the train upon which the emperor Francis Joseph of Austria was supposed to be riding, last Saturday. No damage was done.

Evangelist Moody is returning to America. He believes that London is now the most religious city in the world, and that the United States is more in need of missionaries than England is.

Some young men in Stonington, Conn., serenaded Deacon Wheeler, of that town, and the deacon came to the door with a pistol and fired at the crowd. He was placed in the care of the sheriff.

A petition is being circulated asking for the abolishment of the music afforded to Sunday visitors at Central Park in this city. Last Sunday the second concert was given to an immense concourse.

There is a complaint among the churches that new hymns and hymn-writers are needed. This want should not be very long or keenly felt while "The Truth Seeker Collection," the "Liberal Hymnbook," and Dr. Weeks's "Songs of the Morning" are in print.

John Swinton calls attention to the following facts. The inference is left to the ingenuity of the reader: "Jim Blaine was nominated by the Republicans at Chicago on Friday (Hangman's Day), June 6, 1884. Governor Cleveland was nominated by the Democrats at Chicago on Friday (Hangman's Day), July 11, 1884. The only candidate in the field not nominated on Hangman's Day is Gen. Butler, who was nominated at Indianapolis, Thursday, May 29, 1884."

Parson Newman has been preaching at Coney Island. The Christian Intelligencer has this unappreciativ notice of his efforts: "Coney Island entered upon its usual desecration of the Lord's Day last Sabbath. At the Manhattan Beach Hotel there was a so-called religious service. The pulpit consisted of a card table on which a champagne basket was placed, and a white cloth cast over the whole. Over this arrangement Rev. J. P. Newman preached a short sermon."

The Democrats in convention at Chicago last week nominated Governor Cleveland, the present governor of New York, for president of the United States, and Thomas A. Hendricks, ex-governor of Indiana, for vice-president. Gov. Ben Butler was there, but his name was not presented to the convention. What he will do with his Greenback and Anti-monopoly nominations is not known, for as a delegate to the Democratic convention it is supposed, as a matter of course, that he will support the Democratic ticket.

The Forged Letters of Pliny.

The famous letter of Pliny to Trajan concerning Christianity in Bithynia early in the second century we would willingly accept as genuin if we could. Christianity began about 75 B.C., and was preached by Paul in Asia Minor until about 20 B.C. It is quite likely, therefore, that small congregations of believers in a martyred messiah existed in Bithynia and other provinces of Asia Minor as early as the beginning of the first century, or more than a hundred years before Pliny was made governor. Marcion, who came to Rome with Paul's epistles about A.D. 138, was the son of a bishop in Pontus. In the reign of Augustus, Pontus was partly absorbed into Bithynia, and after A.D. 63, they were spoken of as one province, Ponti et Bithynia (Smith's Gr. and Rom. Geog.). Galatia bounded Bithynia on the south, and joined Pontus on the east.

But we are compelled to discredit the letter of Pliny for two cogent reasons heretofore given (Rev. of Ant. p. 32), which we now repeat.

1. The writer flatly contradicts himself. He first says that he has never been present at any trials of Christians, and then tells about subjecting two female slaves to torture, but discovering that they were actuated by an absurd and excessiv superstition, he deemed it expedient to adjourn all further trial until he could consult the emperor. The Latin word for trial in both instances is cognitio. The governor of Bithynia could not hav contradicted himself thus; it was the blunder of a forger.

2. In this letter of ninety-eight lines, the word "Christian" occurs seven times; "Christ" three times, and "Christianity" once; and in Trajan's answer of eighteen lines, "Christian" occurs twice. In none of the rest of the letters is either of these words to be found, or any illusion to Christianity.

But there is reason to suspect that all the letters of Pliny are spurious. He was proconsul of Bithynia about A.D. 110. Some say 103, but that is a mistake, as Gibbon has shown in his "Vindication." The only other work of Pliny that we hav is "A Panegyric of Trajan." If he wrote the letters he was a literary coxcomb. Imagin a volume of letters by the late Edward Everett beginning thus:

"MY DEAR MR. SMITH: You hav frequently pressed me to make a select collection of my letters (if, in truth, there be any which deserve a preference), and giv them to the public. I hav selected them accordingly."

For "My dear Mr. Smith," read, "To Septitius," and you hav the first letter of Pliny. He selects two hundred and thirty-seven for publication without a single answer—as if he had taken care to keep a copy of all he wrote, but did not preserve the replies of his distinguished correspondents! His inordinate vanity is exhibited in quoting poetry in praise of himself; in descanting upon his own orations, and in repeated self-laudation. If we are to believe him, he and Tacitus were the two great writers of the time, and as a leading lawyer, he commends himself for never having received a fee, reward, or present! Credat, L.L.D.!

After giving to the public nine books of his own letters, as requested, he condescends in the last book to publish forty-eight answers of the emperor. This looks suspicious; but there are other reasons for discrediting the tenth book, even if the other nine are genuin.

1. At the beginning of the tenth book the English translator (William Melmoth, 1746) makes the following significant note:

"The greater part of the following letters were written by Pliny during his administration of the province of Bithynia. They are of a style and character extremely different from those in the preceding collection, whence some critics hav injudiciously inferred that they are the production of another hand, not considering that the occasion necessarily required a different manner."

Pliny having announced at the outset, in obedience to the oft-repeated request of Septitius (Smith?), a selection of his own letters for publication, letters addressed to Tacitus, Suetonius, Quinctilian, and all the noted authors of that time, together with some that appear to be not contemporary, departs from the original plan in the tenth book, and givs fifty common-place and unimportant letters of Trajan. Why did he not assign a reason for such a departure? And having made the departure, why did he not giv some excuse for suppressing the far more important letters of his other distinguished correspondents?

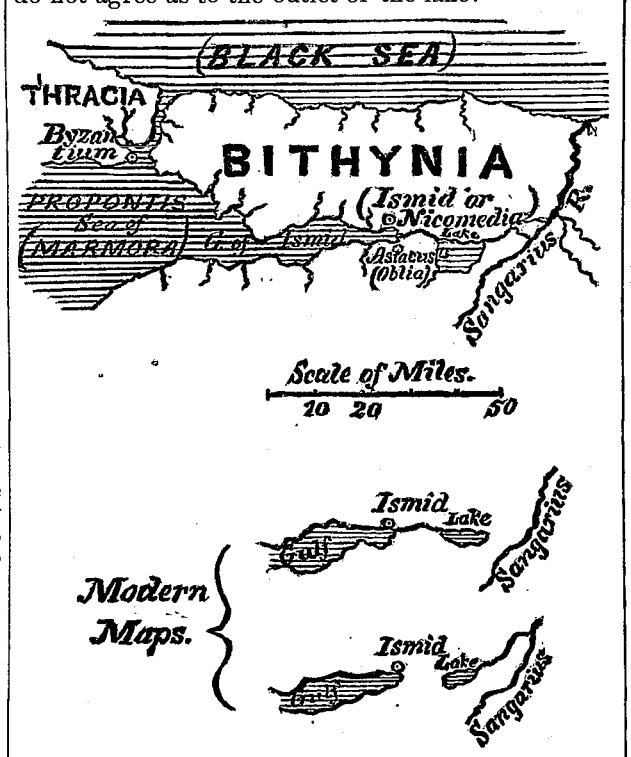
2. Many of the letters in the tenth book are of too little importance for the consideration of a proconsul, much less of a Roman emperor. In letter 117 Pliny says:

"It is customary in this city [Nicomedia] upon any person's either taking the manly robe, solemnizing his marriage, entering upon the office of magistrate, or dedicating any public work, to invite the whole Senate, together with a considerable part of the commonalty, to a feast, and to distribute to each of the company one or two denarii. I request you to inform me whether you think proper this ceremony should continue to be observed, or how far you approve of it."

A denarius was equal to fourteen cents, and Pliny suggested that when there were a thousand persons present the distribution of so much money might hav the appearance of factious largesses. Trajan in his answer agrees with Pliny—indeed they rarely differ about anything—and grants him full power to do as he pleases. Can it be possible that the emperor troubled himself about such trifles?

3. In letter 52 Pliny says:

"Upon examining the public expenses of the city of Byzantium, which I find are extremely great, I was informed, sir (Domine), that the appointments of embassador, which they send yearly to you with their homage and the decree which passes in the Senate upon that occasion, amount to 12,000 sesterces [$480]. But knowing the generous maxims of your government, I thought proper to send the decree without the embassador."



He further says that he has saved to the city $120 by dispensing with an envoy to Moesia, and he wishes to know whether these economical acts meet the emperor's approval. Trajan answers affirmativly, as usual.

Now what had the governor of Bithynia to do with Byzantium, the capital of the province of Thrace, on the other side of the Bosphorus? But even supposing that Pliny had jurisdiction over that province or city (now Constantinople), would he write to Trajan about the paltry saving of $700 in all, when matters of a thousand times greater magnitude required his attention? In letter 46 he tells of $200,000 being wasted in his own capital, Nicomedia, in building an aqueduct, and proposes a further large expenditure in procuring water from another source. And in letter 48 he says that Nicea has expended for a theater over $400,000, the foundation of which is insecure, and the walls are cracking; therefore, he wants permission to discontinue or destroy the work. Such large expenditures are in striking contrast with the paltry ones, and we cannot resist the conviction that these letters were fabricated by a literary crank about the end of the second century.

4. But there is yet a stronger evidence of forgery. We quote from letter 50:

"Bordering upon the territories of Nicomedia is a most extensiv lake, upon which the commodities of the country are easily and cheaply transported to the high road, but from thence are conveyed in carriages to the seaside at great charge and labor."

That "most extensiv lake" was never more than ten miles miles long, as may be seen by a map in Vol. IV. of Rawlinson's Herodotus. It there has two streams running from it, one directly west about ten miles and emptying into the gulf on the Propontis (Sea of Marmora) near the city of Nicomedia (not then built); and the other running northeasterly about twelve miles and discharging by two branches into the river Sangarius, which empties into the Black Sea about twenty-five miles further northward. Here is a map of Bithynia outlined from Rawlinson's, representing the lake as it was 450 years B.C. And we hav subjoined two different modern maps which do not agree as to the outlet of the lake:

Pliny wishes to improve the navigation of this "most extensiv lake" by opening a canal between it and the sea. He says:

"It only remains then to send hither, if you shall think proper, a surveyor or an architect, in order to examin whether the lake lies above the level of the sea (!), the engineers of this province being of opinion that the former is higher by forty cubits."

Is it possible that the learned Pliny did not know whether the lake was higher than the sea? If it was lower, no stream would run from it, and its water would be salt. If a stream ran out of it to the gulf, or to the river Sangarius, then, of course, the lake was higher than the sea. And all the maps we hav seen, ancient or modern, which represent the lake at all, hav it discharging its waters one way or the other, or both ways.

The writer then speaks of an old unfinished canal in the neighborhood, cut by some former king, "either to drain the lands or communicate between the lake and the river;" and he wishes Trajan to "hav the glory of executing what kings could only attempt."

"As if," says a former commentator, "an emperor of Rome could not do more than a little king of Bithynia." This criticism the translator makes a ludicrous attempt to answer. "It is much more probable," says he, "that this critic should be mistaken in his objection than Pliny in his compliment, and though he will hav it to be a little king, it is more reasonable to suppose our author meant some great king of Persia."

The emperor returns a favorable answer to the scheme, but says:

"You must first carefully examin the situation of this body of water, what quantity it contains, and from whence it is supplied; lest by giving it an opening in the sea it should be totally drained."

How ingenious! Trajan knows that water runs down hill! And Pliny answers, saying that the emperor's apprehensions are agreeable to that sagacity he so eminently possesses! But not to be outdone in sagacity, Pliny thinks he has found a method of keeping the water in the lake. In letter 69 he says:

"A channel may be cut from the lake to the river, and a narrow slip of land left between them."

Brilliant idea! But this intervening ridge he thinks may not be necessary:

"For, in the first place, the lake is considerably deep, and in the next, by damming up a river which runs from it on the opposit side, and turning its course as we shall find expedient, the same quantity of water may still be retained. Besides, there are several little brooks near the place where it is proposed the channel shall be cut, which, if skilfully collected, will supply the lake with water in proportion to what it shall discharge. But if you should rather approve of the channel's being extended farther and cut narrower, and so conveyed directly into the sea, without running into the river, the reflux of the tide will return whatever it receives from the lake."

After taxing our intellectual faculties to understand what this writer meant, and coming to the conviction that he did not know himself what he meant, we at last happened to think that there could be no tide in the Sea of Marmora, which is only an enlargement of the river that conveys the waters of the Black Sea into the Grecian archipelago. And upon consulting the American Cyclopedia we find that there is "no observable ebb and flow" in the Black Sea, and "no tides" in the Sea of Marmora.

Here, then, we discover that the forger has "given himself away." Living at some place on the Mediterranean, where the tides were sensible, he supposed that they existed everywhere.

We hav expressed the conviction that these letters were fabricated about the end of the second century, or some fifty years after the death of Pliny. Tertullian refers to the two letters concerning the Christians, and Eusebius repeats what Tertullian says. It is possible, therefore, that the passage in Tertullian is an interpolation, in which case the forgery of the letters of Pliny may be assigned to the third or fourth century.

The Great Confutant.

The great Talmage came to our Western capitals to answer Ingersoll, who had preceded him a week or two. Judging by reports, Talmage is a very great natural orator; for he has a very poor voice, an unpleasant manner, and repulsiv appearance. Yet ere he is through with his oration, all sense of these and of his ludicrious mannerisms is completely lost in admiration and sympathy. One thing I liked especially about him; that was his simple, unostentatious way of traveling, so admirably in contrast with the pride, pomp, and circumstance that some others exhibit. No special palace car, no toadying attendants, no glorifying committees to salute, introduce, and giv him valediction. So, at least, he came and left here.

But the man seems not to hav the remotest conception of what an argument is, like so many others of his cloth. It was astounding to hear this literal Bible believer and interpreter set out in his assault on Robert the Great by telling his hearers that "false in one, false in all" is the universally admitted maxim. Any book or witness or statement that makes a false assertion on one point is rightly taken to be false in all. And so he goes on to set up a man of straw and pelt him down. No book was ever so open to this objection, and no speaker, as Talmage and his Bible. Not that he wilfully misstates, but he is utterly incapable of criticising the book or his creed. He quotes just enough to satisfy himself. Thus, to show his fallacious method of treating matters, in order to show that the flood story is not an impossible one, he says it was not such a great deluge after all, for the country where it happened was a kind of valley or bowl-shaped region, and the writers spoke of the affair as they saw it. He forgets his book says, "Not a soul that breathed was left alive; even the fowls of the air perished" (save Noah, etc.). So he takes up the great subject of polygamy, which it seems Ingersoll accuses the holy scriptures of upholding. He, in reply, says the Bible mentions many things. It speaks of murder, lust, sin of all kinds, but does it therefore approve them? By no means. As to this polygamy, this infamous slander on God and Bible, let us see. False in one, false in all, Mr. Ingersoll. If you hav falsely accused on one point, you are false in all things. How many wives did God make for Adam? Ah, hah! How many wives had Noah? And so on, mentioning some few others. But David had several wives. True, and was he not punished? Solomon had many wives; was he not punished? Every man spoken of in the Bible who thus violated the laws of God was punished. "False in one, false in all." Down you must go, Bob Ingersoll. You hav by half quotations and misconstructions slandered our holy book by these horrid accusations. Shame on you! See how with one flash from my light I hav exposed you.

And thus he replied to Ingersoll, and no doubt nine-tenths of his audience were carried away to judge by the applause. Successful oratory is the art of destroying reason for the time; one is so captivated and deliciously thrilled he does not want to think.

Now the orator is unconsciously guilty of the very "false in one, false in all," he accuses in his opponent. Such a mode of arguing is precisely equivalent to this: the James boys are accused of having robbed the trains; of having broken into banks and robbed them; of having committed murder. Answer: This is a false accusation and I will put you down at once, and as you are false in one, you are false in all things. Thousands of people hav seen the James boys riding in the cars peacefully. They are on the best of terms with all the conductors. It is known that at one time they prevented a frightful accident by warning a train of a lost bridge just before it reached the spot. They patronize banks; deposit largely in them; always keep their money in banks. As to murder, robbery, and the like, why, the James boys are the kindest-hearted, most chivalrous and benevolent beings that liv. Then, innumerable instances might be referred to showing their excellent dispositions.

As to the polygamy charge against the Bible, let this be said: Within its covers there is not one single direct prohibition of it, although its whole action from Alpha to Omega transpires among people where polygamy was practiced on the largest scale, and, what is worse, concubines and slaves were held. And yet laws are given upon about every subject of human action, and recorded in that book, that applied to a time, at least, of sixteen hundred years. Laws are given as to treatment of wives, slaves, and concubines that recognize polygamy. Thus, for one instance, "if a man hav two wives, one beloved, the other hated" etc. (Deut. xxi, 15). (See Exodus xxii, 16.) No distinction between married and single men in such cases. Polygamy is regulated by statutes; thus, while a wife was living, the sister of the wife could not be married to her husband (Lev. xviii, 18). So mother and daughter could not hav the same husband (Lev. xx, 14). A priest could hav one wife—a virgin (Lev. xxi, 13, 14). Slavery, the fountain of concubinage, is established by a statute that is perfect. Would that our Congress and state law-makers made their statutes so clear, plain, and undoubted as is Lev. xxv, 44–46. No question as to interpreting the meaning could arise. Who shall be slaves, how, whose, "and they shall be your bondmen forever." All is told in tersest, apt language. Provisions as to new wives taken (Deut. xxiv, 5). (See also Numbers v, 27, 28) —the most of the chapter for the Theocratic Method of Assuaging Jealousies. Here is a method worthy of a patent. The water therein mentioned should be prepared by some Ayer, Radway, or Pierce, and sold in bottles. No house should be without it. Jealous husbands could hav a constant quietus for their passions, and frisky wives a monitor. How be it if Talmage preacheth a sermon upon that text?

Well, do not the foregoing squint very strongly toward polygamy and its worse sister, concubinage? Not one word of inhibition. It is like the Missouri liquor law—all regulation, no prohibition.

But the wicked polygamists were punished. Let us see. David, the man after God's own heart, the man of numerous wives, was punished for the matter of Uriah the Hitite—for murderously getting one of the wives. In fifty places David is spoken of as the great example of what God's own friend should be. "His heart was perfect with his God all his days;" and such like references are made repeatedly. Here is one (see 1 Kings xv, 5): "Because David did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, and turned not aside from any thing that he commanded him all the days of his life, save only in the matter of Uriah the Hitite." See also the references there made. How about the many-wived and myriad-concubined Solomon? He also was so intimate with Jehovah that the latter came to him in visions. Notwithstanding this intimacy, it seems another god, old Baal, had more influence with Solomon in his latter days. It was for this that Jehovah got after him.

Let us consider Rehoboam, his son (2 Chron. xi). He for a long time followed the law of the Lord at first. He had the old man's love for women. He was always "taking," and "loving," and "desiring." For three years he and "they," "those who set their hearts to seek the Lord," walked in the ways of David and Solomon. "And he dealt wisely and dispersed his children throughout all the countries," etc. "And he desired many wives." But afterwards it came to pass that Rehoboam forsook the law of the Lord and all Israel with him. From the context we may believe polygamy was the law of the Lord. Certainly if such loose talk as Talmage has is argument, we might logically so conclude.

Chronicles givs short sketches of all the kings, telling how this one obeyed the Lord even as David did. Some are mentioned as having wives. We know that of course they all had many wives. One Joash (2 Chron. xxiv) did especially serve God all the days of Jehoida, the high priest of this god, and who gave the poor young man, his king, two wives. Here certainly is recognition, historic, theocratic, and religious, of polygamy. This high priest was such a good man his life was miraculously prolonged to 130 years, we may infer, and he received a grand burial for his good in Israel, both to God's and David's house. After this, Joash left God and worshipped groves and idols, and wrath came upon Judah for it. After him came Amaziah, whose heart was with God, but not perfectly. Nothing is said of his wives, and perhaps therein he was imperfect even as David was not. But this Amaziah was an amazing good man; for on one occasion, when favored by the Lord, he made an immense slaughter, and carried back other ten thousand captivs whom he had thrown from a high rock. Later he brought back an idol from some great victory, and setting it up, began to worship it. Surely the most surprising fact about all these favorits of Jehovah, his intimates for whom he works his miracles, is this proneness of theirs to worship any idol they happen to capture. Perhaps their quick desertion of their theocratic friend is merely another exemplification of the saying, "Familiarity breeds contempt."

Matters in Texas.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The inclosed clipping from the Galveston News is an address delivered before the State Teachers' Association, which met at San Antonio on the 24th, by that stanch Liberal, Gov. Roberts, of Texas. I send it to you knowing that you will be glad to publish in your columns the utterances of the only governor in the country who was plucky enough to resist that mawkish sentiment which would hav made him commander of the Lord's host in Texas.

The great and only Dr. Dietzler, who is said, by his admirers, to belong not merely to the church militant, but to the church triumphant as well, is here fighting in the cause of the meek and lowly Nazarene, and though he handles his mind batteries with the well-known skill of his class, the public, generally, and even a few believers, appear to be rather disappointed in him. Indeed, I hav noticed since his visit, as well as that of Clark Braden, who honored us some months ago, that such lectures succeed rather in making men, who had till then concealed their opinions, bolder and more outspoken—and not in their favor either.

It is unnecessary to tell you that he confines himself to the same old line of so-called argument which has been worn threadbare by frequent repetition and refutation. Nor can he be blamed; he does his best. It is his cause which is weak. It is true the reverend gentleman might hav made less use of such epithets as "liar," "ignoramus," and various other "arguments" of a like nature; still, when a learned man has brought himself so far as to favor such a cause, nothing that he says or does need excite surprise.

As for his lecture, in only one instance does he make an effort to prove what he advocates. He attempts to make Moses and the geologists agree by quibbling and garbling, and by reading out such parts of the Bible as suit his case, leaving his devout hearers in blissful ignorance of the context—no one being less conversant with the holy book than the average Christian.

For the rest, he disposes of Ingersoll by calling him a liar and "Bobby." He laments that such an "ignoramus" as Beecher should presume to speak on so vital a subject as religion; and declares Draper a second-class man. He proves (to his own satisfaction) that Huxley is either a knave or a fool, and that Darwin forsook his favorit theory. He complains, bitterly, that Infidel lecturers can go to Boston, Chicago, and New York, and meet large audiences, who express their appreciation in loud applause. Why the worthy doctor does not go and do likewise does not appear. He prefers to come to such centers of refinement as Marlin and gather together nearly seventy-five people, and proceed to tell them that Shakspere, Milton, Napoleon, Washington, and sundry other great men were Christians, leaving it to be inferred that, as a consequence, we should all believe as they did in the matter, an "argument" not entirely original with him.

The Blanco Star-Vindicator anounces that the debate between Revs. Dietzler and Sweeney, on the subject of "Baptism," will take place on July 18th, whereupon the Galveston News, rejoicing, says: "It will giv Dietzler a chance to abuse his opponent and giv the papers a rest." The Weatherford Methodist and Texas Christian Campbellite paper are at war. The former believes it its duty to defend the gospel against Campbellism and "many other false systems." I hope you will be glad to learn that a Christian paper has at last been found which voluntarily told the truth.

GOVERNOR ROBERTS'S ADDRESS.

[The question of methods of moral instruction in public schools was taken up and discussed by seven educators. During the interchange of views much was said against the use of intoxicating drinks, and in condemnation of places of resort where beer and wine were dispensed. While the various phases of moral instruction were being commented upon, the question of the constitutional exclusion of Bible reading in public schools was propounded, and Governor Roberts called upon to answer. In reply, he said:]

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN: The constitution of the state of Texas, in making provision for education, took charge of the free public schools within its territory. It is to be done by a fund already accumulated by the sale or lease of lands that hav been in former times appropriated to the purposes of education. I will say just here that there are not less than thirty million acres of land yet unsold, and there are several millions of dollars —I forget the exact amount—in the shape of lands, and other means, which constitute the available fund. The state proposed to take the schools into her charge—not to the detriment of private schools. In addition she now adds the taxation of the people for carrying out the same purpose, which may amount, as standing now, to some twenty cents on the one hundred dollars, ad valorem taxes, and one-fourth of the occupation tax, and one dollar poll tax, with the permanent fund. This constitutes the only amount to be distributed, and is quite a large amount. Who pays the taxes? Everybody who returns their poll tax. Who are they? What class do they belong to? Very nearly all classes in Christendom. There is the Englishman, Irishman, Scotchman, German, Italian, Frenchman, Swede, Norwegian—all of different creeds and religion. Now, it was thought, by those who framed this constitution, that as those people were all required to pay taxes to educate the rising generation of the country, they should hav equal rights in the schools to be carried on by the public. Now, what means did they adopt? I say this constitution indicated a fund by which this should be accomplished. The fund thus raised by taxation and donation should be given to no sectarian schools. The law that has been passed in pursuance of that constitution is intended to carry the same idea. I do not now recollect the exact language of the law, but it was designed to carry out that idea. There is a difference of opinion as to what the word sectarian means. Sectarian in one limited sense means Baptist, Methodist, Episcopalian, etc., and in another sense it means the religion of a sect. I think that is what Webster would tell you is the meaning. It means the religion of a Jew, Turk, or Chinaman. It would mean not only the sect in the ordinary character—it would mean any sort of religion, or none at all. For instance, the Liberalists, who do not agree with the orthodox doctrins of the day. Now, as to the people paying the taxes that constitute the fund that educates the children, the most liberal hav thought there is to be no species of religion at all in the school. Now, the question arises, can a Catholic teacher teach a school without having the children put a cross on their forehead? Is it practical for any one of the Christian denominations to teach without giving some sort of bias in favor of that denomination? If such a thing is practicable, it must be permissible. The Jews are a very large class in this state, and pay a large amount of taxes. It is well-known the Jews would be very highly offended if the New Testament were used, and the Catholics if the Old Testament. I take it that the founders of our system thought that the teachings of religion should not be of such a character as to bias the mind of the children in any particular section. This is my idea of it, and that, I think, is a view which lawyer and statesman in this case will take of it; that as all contribute to accumulate this fund, all ought to enjoy an equal advantage. Now I would say something about my German friends. I go to their gardens and never see anything wrong about them. I hav never seen any one party more polite, and with more gentle principles, than that I hav seen in the Turner hall at Austin. I would right here say that, in my opinion, based on a very long experience, is the very best way to encourage the drinking of wine and beer. You never saw any one, after taking a glass of wine or beer, who wanted to do some violent act. Drunkenness is the disgrace of our country; and in defense of our colored citizens, I think it is the best education that has ever been introduced in the state of Texas, as it banishes strong drink and the infamous habit of drunkenness. Wine and beer do not put the Old Scratch into their heads. Whisky does, and brandy too. There is a wide field of morality that ought to be introduced into the schools, that does not intrench upon anybody's ideas of religion, and this is the purpose of the constitution and laws of this country. If they be wrong, why, it is for the people to renovate them. I giv it as my opinion it is not wrong.

Communications.

A Call for the Eighth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League.

All citizens of the United States, whether they hav heretofore acted with this League or not, who believe in a secular government and a secular republic, separation of church and state, the equality of all citizens before the law, without distinction of creed or race or sex; justice for all, and privileges and monopolies for none; the need of universal secular education, free speech, and a free press as the basis of universal suffrage, are invited to appear or to be represented at the Eighth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, to be held at Cassadaga Lake, Chautauqua Co., New York, on Monday and Tuesday, the 8th and 9th of September next (at the close of the New York Freethinkers' Convention at that place).

The League has for its objects the purposes above stated, and has sought to carry them out by securing:

1. The total separation of church and state; this is the first and chief object of the League, and includes among other things the taxation of church property and the suppression of sectarian appropriations; and, as necessary to that general object, the League insists upon,
2. The protection of all citizens in their equal religious, civil, and political rights, without regard to religious belief or want of such belief.
3. The universal, secular, and scientific education of the people, so as to emancipate them from the prevalent superstitions.
4. The impartial, secular administration and enforcement of the laws by secular authorities only, who shall be directly responsible to the people.
5. The inviolability of the mails, and their impartial administration for postal purposes only.
6. Freedom of the press and of speech, without any censorship except responsibility before the jury of the country for any abuse of that freedom.

Year by year we find that the above principles and measures are openly or covertly violated more and more in every state and by the general government, and chiefly through church influences. Any sect, church, or "religion" that militates against these principles openly or covertly, directly or indirectly, is the enemy of American liberty and of the American people. The League is opposed to churches and "religions" only as they are opposed to liberty and to the rights of man, the general education of the people, and the progress of mankind.

All American citizens, therefore, to whom these principles and objects commend themselvs, should rally to their support by a common and permanent organization, which is now the National Liberal League, and should make it the nurse and defender of freedom in every town and state as well as in the nation. In no other way can "the blessings of liberty," the birth-right of American freemen, be effectivly maintained. At this Congress it is designed to revise the basis of the League so as to make it so broad and Liberal that all who sympathize with its general purpose may co-operate with it to the end that a general union of all citizens of Liberal sentiments may result, and that new officers of the League may be selected without regard to past differences.

All Charter and Life Members of the League, and all delegates from local Auxiliary Leagues, will hav votes in the Congress. Each Auxiliary is entitled to send five delegates—its president, secretary, and three other members—to the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats in the Congress, and to votes by the permission of the Congress.

Combine, then, for your common defense, for general secular education, and for the firm support of the essentials of free institutions. Let it not be your fault if, in the growth and prosperity of our people, their liberties and yours are frittered away and lost!

Dated New York, July 12, 1884.

T. B. Wakeman, President N. L. L.
Elizur Wright, 1st Vice-President.
T. C. Leland, Secretary, 744 Broadway, New York.

Miss Gibson Makes a Nomination.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: With due regard for all the names proposed for a League president, permit me to inquire why the man whose "meetings," Mr. Putnam declares, "hav been the most successful and pregnant ever held upon this continent," would not make a good League president? Mr. Putnam also says (see The Truth Seeker, July 12th), "Where would the New York State Freethinkers' Association hav been to-day if it had not been for the strenuous devotion of H. L. Green to its success?" From personal knowledge I can answer, nowhere! Therefore, I present the name of H. L. Green for our next League president.

My interest in this association did not commence when I became a charter member at the organization of the National League in Philadelphia, 1876, but dates back to its very incipiency; hence my desire that none of the disasters befall it pointed out by Mr. Putnam and others. Again, I inquire, why not giv the presidency to the most indefatigable worker in our ranks, and one who has earned such a reputation as Mr. Putnam justly awards him?

Will "N. G. W." giv the names of the candidates nominated for president and vice-president by the "American (or God-in-the-Constitution) party?"

Barre, Mass., July 11, 284. Ella E. Gibson.

A Vigorous Protest from Mrs. Severance.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I am amazed at reading Green's nominations for the proposed new deal. Wouldn't there be liable to be harmony with such men on a committee as Walker, Abbot, Wakeman, Bundy, Adonis, etc.! Wouldn't it be a fine thing to hav a man like Bundy, who is at every possible opportunity defaming such men as Wakeman, and others equally good, and traducing the League on every possible occasion. A man who will for some little personal pique or for a difference of opinion flood the country with vile libelous charges, and in every possible way try to injure any one who will not bow to his august decrees—men who are capable of resorting to such measures as did he and Underwood to try to stab to death a brother editor and Liberal while unjustly imprisoned, and helpless to defend himself—the latter of whom Green himself pronounced dishonest and repudiated!—no, sir! no such men as these are wanted, or could be of use in the League. Men who must rule or ruin—a million of such men would not be worth a hundred men and women like those who compose the League today, who are strong, honest, reliable, self-sacrificing adherents of principles which are vital, and which they will maintain. If the new deal means any such incongruous combination of elements, it means a dishonorable death, and the sooner it dies, the better for Liberalism. There will be no backward movement of the League, or I am greatly mistaken in my estimation of the quality of the metal now composing it. Juliet H. Severance, M.D.

One World at a Time.

From the showing of our excellent ally in Milwaukee it is evident that she goes for two worlds—and, maybe, more than two, as "spirits" hav reported from Neptune, Jupiter, and other planets. But she is mistaken when she supposes Liberals opposed to the investigation of spiritual phenomena. All the Liberals I know are in favor of investigation. Those who hav investigated the most hav the least faith in mystical phenomena.

And if, as Mrs. J. H. Severance seems to think, spiritual phenomena belong to this world, I beg of her to tell us why modern mediumship was delayed so long after the race had begun. Modern mediumship was born in a "haunted house" in 1848. If we suppose that the angels two hundred thousand years, more or less, had been fully cognizant of all forms of human suffering, and yet they did nothing for our relief, does not seem to tell much in their favor. With the modern "rap" I hav been familiar from the first, in 1848, in the Fox family, till the last one this day. And my opinion is that those scientific men, and others, who hav investigated mediumistic phenomena the most, hav the least faith in them.

Still, we hav humanity's hope for the future, that it must be better, whatever that state may be. We submit to nature's order that in death annihilates our connection, as it does our knowledge, of this world. But my object is not to argue any question here with Mrs. Severance. I wish rather to suggest to her how numerous the unknown factors in her theory are; and how many of the bottom facts she has overlooked in her contribution.

A Mr. Truesdell has published a popular book on what he calls "the bottom facts." But Mr. Truesdell is himself a medium, and of that class of human beings upon whom "spirits" depend for all they know of us, or our world. He is himself a "bottom fact," and failing to appreciate that fact, his book is a deception, and somewhat of a fraud.

All we know, or can know, of Spiritualism is the phenomena. We do not know how or by whom they are produced, except that the brain of a medium is a factor, and all else is unknown. Thus: 1. We know nothing as to the personal identity of an invisibility, nothing as to their origin, their number, their sexhood, character, occupation, food, dress, disposition, mating, nor the world they innabit. And it seems enough for us to know that they do not belong to our world, especially when we bear in mind the number of mediums "under spirit control" that hav committed suicide, and, too, that hav reported themselvs mothers of "spirit babes," begotten by "spirit fathers."

2. We do not know that the invisibles would ever hav answered to the name of "spirit" if this term had not been at first suggested by Mrs. Fox in that "haunted house."

3. We do not know that spirits hav any external senses by which they can obtain any external knowledge of us and this physical world without the brain of a medium.

4. We do not know that spirits sustain any relation to us except what they assume to gratify the medium and interested parties.

5. How do you prove that spirits sustain any relation to this physical world? Spirits hav declared that they were from the planets.

6. How do you prove that death is not the annihilation of our memory, and all our relations to this world?

7. How do you prove that all the knowledge that spirits evince of us is not obtained by contact with this earth?

8. How do you prove that there is ever more than one spirit to each medium?

9. How do you arrest, try, and punish an invisible criminal?

For Spiritualists I hav feelings of kindness and respect. And I could wish they might become a power sufficient to wipe out ancient mediumism from the face of our planet. And but for these unknown factors, and were the subject really all that the enthusiastic faith of its victims estimates it for, it would hav done this long ago. A Rustic.

Livezey's Growls.

It is hardly worth while to bother with Mr. F. B. Livezey, but as Mr. A. G. Church challenged him through our columns to make good his assertion about "Infidel assassins," and as Mr. Livezey has responded in a characteristic circular, it may be due to him to hear what he has to say. The "proof" he alleges reads:

"I hav been called upon by A. G. Church, of Squaw Creek, Idaho, in The Truth Seeker of May 24, 1884, page 324, to prove my charges against Infidel persecutors. I here consider one of many cases. 1st. Are not letters from friends and foes and articles from newspapers to be accredited as proof of a thing? 2d. If letters and newspaper articles charge a shooting upon a man, are they not proofs that the shooting was done. 3d. Is the statement of a surgeon who extracted the ball not proof that a victim was shot? 4th. Is the statement of a witness who saw the assassin chase his victim, shoot him, fell him to the ground, and hollo, 'I fetched him,' not proof of the shooting? 5th. Is the statement of a man who was knocked down immediately after the shooting of man No. 1 by the butt end of the assassin's pistol, breaking his nose, no proof of the murderous tirade of the assassin, additionally, when, immediately after this, the same pistol was pointed at and within a foot of a lady's face, all in or at the door of a church on Sunday? 6th. Is it not proof that the victim No. 1 was shot, when his wife writes that it reduced him to the point of death, and the both of them had to flee the state of Oregon to avoid a repetition, leaving behind a thrifty farm, earned by their own exertions? 7th. Is the published statement of a well-known Infidel of the county in which the shooting happened, not a proof of it, when it reads, in part, thus: 'Shooting a human being is deplorable in most cases, but the regret in this case is that the ball didn't take a more fatal course?' 8th. If the assassin's own mother acknowledges him to be a 'well-known Infidel,' is that not proof that he was?"

While Mr. Livezey carefully suppresses names and places, it is not difficult to determin what is meant. There is no doubt that a case of shooting once occurred in Oregon. The perforated individual was the Rev. L. T. Nichols. The kind of a man he is was thus explained by the New Northwest, published in Portland, Oregon, a year ago last May:

A blight has recently fallen upon several families in Yamhill county, and one or two in Lafayette, through the preaching of a certain "Christadelphian," who induces his followers, chiefly women, to forsake all earthly ties, and "separating themselvs from the world," become a "peculiar people,' ready to induce and endure all sorts of martyrdom in this life that they may be of the favored few who are to enjoy the "first resurrection" and so inherit "eternal life." Every clear-headed person can see through the veneering of this man's preaching. It is Mormonism, pure and simple, and will end by the avenging bullet of some outraged son or husband, unless the sanctimonious wolf in sheep's clothing can elude them till he gets hold of property enough to line his pockets in the name of the "church," and then, of course, he can get away with the swag, women and all. He is already coaxing his followers to go with him to the "holy land," which to the initiated means Utah, or some other place where the dupes of an unnatural religion may get their eyes open after it is too late to help themselvs. At present they are stark crazy through the influence of his magnetism, and can no more be reasoned with than so many March hares.

The reason of the shooting is told at length by a Lafayette (Or.) correspondent of the Yamhill Reporter. The account was printed in these columns July 14, 1883, as just previous to this Mr. Nichols had challenged the Freethinkers of the coast to debate with him. It is from this account Livezey quotes, and we print it again entire:

Last Sunday, the 10th of June, about 11 o'clock, A.M., news was brought to town that Rev. L. T. Nichols, Christadelphian preacher, was shot and fatally wounded, while preaching to his congregation. Dr. Calbreath was called out and found the man wounded by a pistol ball. The shot had taken effect about two inches to the left of the spine and just above the hip joint; the ball, glancing, passed around among the muscles of the left side and lodged within about two inches of the navel. Had it passed through the cavity, it would probably hav been fatal; as it is, the injury is but slight. Of course the shooting caused some excitement, and the "Soul Sleepers" (Christadelphians) and their creed was pretty thoroughly canvassed. I picked up so much of their history as you get here:

About five or six years ago this man man Nichols arrived here in this county from Salt Lake. He professed to come with a revelation and a mission. By this revelation he was commanded to establish a new church, with a set of tenets, new in some respects, but smacking strongly of Mormonism in their general features. The principles of his doctrin required that all members should be independent of the outside world; that they must abandon all ornament, either personal or otherwise; that education, except enough to read the Bible, was worldly and must be shunned; that members should indulge in the holy kiss; that all property owned by members belonged to the Lord, and that he was the agent of the Lord; that food must be of the simplest kind—no tea, no coffee, no sugar, no leaven in the bread, and no seasoning of any kind; that all house ornaments and musical instruments must be thrown aside; that they must not giv testimony, vote, or take any part in the government of the state, but to be governed by him as the Lord's deputy; that a parent having a child not belonging to his church should be disowned and discarded; that they should hold themselvs entirely aloof from others and look on them as mere worldlings, whose society would be contaminating; that the only thing that could keep a believing wife tied to a non-believing husband, or vice versa, is the force of the law—a force to be set aside as soon as possible.

With these tenets he went amongst the people and succeeded in getting a number, mostly ignorant, soft-headed women, under his control. A few men joined him, but the greater part dropped the business when they saw its drift,

For a while things went along smoothly, but in time the man became bolder and demanded more sacrifices; for instance, that children should be turned over to him, especially the girls, for religious training.

Soon a discontented muttering was heard; there was altogether too much meddling in family matters. Husbands and sons began to see that Brother Nichols was more potent at the family fireside than they were; food was cooked according to Nichols, wives and children were dressed by the same authority, and all family intercourses were conducted according to the letter of his law.

It was observed that in practicing the holy kiss Brother Nichols was chaste enough with the old and ugly sisters, but the young, good looking ones always received a vigorous hug, and a lingering on the kiss that looked altogether too carnal, and in some cases, where the sister was buxom, smacked decidedly of the lascivious. Of course all this could hav but one result. Husbands objected to having everything about them a la Nichols; even in kissing their wives they must conform to his rule. Husbands objected and wives persisted; family troubles followed where peace had reigned and ought to reign. There were separations because of it, and men were compelled to threaten Nichols's life if he came about their houses because of it. But the fellow persisted. He invaded the family privacy and advised the wife against her home interests, against everything that is considered lawful and sacred, and they believed in him.

One point always appeared plain in this man's labor, and that was, that he never bothered himself much about any only such as had property, or a good prospect of getting it. Among his victims—for we may call his adherents nothing else—is a lady of this town, Mrs. Martin, wife of the late Frank Martin. Mrs. Martin had considerable property in her own right, and her husband dying willed all his to her, but stipulated that the minor heirs should be properly educated. Soon after Mr. Martin's death, Nichols, who had an eye to business, managed to get the complete control of Mrs. Martin, and the result was soon apparent. She took her children from school, forbade their associating with the older members of the family, and was about to send her daughter, about eleven or twelve years old, to be instructed by Nichols, and declared that her property belonged to the Lord, which was readily understood to be equivalent to saying that it belonged to Nichols. About the same time rumor had it that all Christadelphians were obliged to turn their property into cash, and gather together in one community. Mrs. Martin's children and her mother, Mrs. Burnett, of McMinnville, all used their best efforts to change the lady's mind, but to no purpose. She remained fixed. Then her oldest son, William, returned, and he and James stood guard over their mother's home and fairly drove Nichols and his dupes off by force and threats.

Last Sunday Mrs. Martin went to the church, a grove about one mile south of this place, and the boys followed to take her home. When Nichols saw them he valiantly took to his heels. Notwithstanding he had taught his people that he could not be hurt, he took himself off lively, and, as his friends say, while he was running, James Martin pursued him on horseback, and shot him in the back. He had taught his dupes that he could not be hurt. That was a part of his revelation. Now they knew that he lied to them.

Shooting a human being is deplorable in most cases, but the regret in this case is that the ball didn't take a more fatal course. We are told that there is no law to protect a household from such scoundrels as this fellow; that under the name of religion any man can force himself on the privacy of a family, regardless of all decency, and do such mischief as he pleases. If this is so, then every man must be a law unto himself, and the revolver the arbiter, and any man who attempts to destroy family relations must know that he takes his life in his hand when he does so. The better way would be, when such as Nichols appears in a community, to giv him notice to leave or be strung up to the first tree. Had Nichols been treated thus, several families now separated might be still living happily together. Allowing such men to ply their vocation is not religious liberty; it is but giving license to swindlers and libertins, and the sooner people and governments take that view of it the better. Away with them, to prison or the gallows!

While everybody regrets the necessity of using the pistol, yet the Martin boys hav the sympathy of nearly all the country, except it may be a few perverse cranks, who always manage to be on the opposit side of every question. But the general expression is sorrow that the ball did not take a more fatal course, whoever fired it—which the Martin boys deny doing.

Frontier justice is apt to be rough and hasty, but it is usually justice. A preacher who in places where the revolver is a familiar toy interferes between man and wife must necessarily hold his life lightly, and if he loses it has no one but himself to blame. Had Mr. Nichols let the women and girls alone; had he been less anxious to hav his dupes consecrate their property to the Lord—meaning Nichols; had he been less ready to greet with holy kiss—in short, not to go over the disgusting details of his career, had he been anything but a scoundrelly Christian adventurer, he would not hav brought upon himself the punishment he did. It is perfectly plain for what he was shot; the only mystery being why he was not shot sooner.

Mr. Livezey intimates that he has several more as good cases as this, but we imagin that until he finds some a good deal better Mr. Church will keep his money in his pocket.

THE pleasant creed of the last sect discovered in Russia is that it is the bounden duty of the faithful to slay all those who do not agree with them in their religious views, and it is said that numbers hav already paid the death penalty for non-conversion.

Mormonism Again.

So many remedies having been recommended for the practice of the Bible doctrin of polygamy in Utah, and all having so signally failed, I, a resident here for the last twenty-three years, and somewhat familiar with the features and phases of Mormonism, would humbly suggest a last and, I am sure, a lasting cure against the evil. My plan would be worth while trying before the Rev. Talmage's amputation method should be resorted to. It is this: Let Congress cease tinkering up, mending, amending, and patching their bills for the suppression of polygamy or any other doctrin founded upon their word of God, the Bible. Instead of sending us richly-endowed ex-senators, ex-congressmen, etc., as commissioners to execute their inefficient laws, let Congress appropriate a few thousand dollars annually, say for three or five years, to each of some such men as John E. Remsburg, George Chainey, Charles B. Reynolds, and, if it could be, to Col. Ingersoll. Send them as missionaries to reason, argue with, and talk to the people. In a few years hence the result would be no kingdom-building in Utah, no polygamy, no necessity for political interference, because there would be no priestly interference here. This people would be as loyal as any other in the Union. Utah would be admitted as one of the great states. Our educational facilities, now so much hindered, would be greatly furthered.

Such a change effected by such men, means, and methods may not suit Talmage, God, and the Christians, but I am more than confident of the good results from personal observation and experience in the town where I liv. Only fourteen years ago the inhabitants here, one and all, were perhaps more devoted to Mormonism and all its tenets than their brethren of the surrounding settlements. At least that was what the highest church authorities here asserted. Now, what a change! The majority, if not avowed Freethinkers, are so tinctured with Liberal views and ideas that only one polygamous marriage has been contracted during that time. Sunday meetings are but slimly attended; tithing, none, or, if at all, flowing in as slow as molasses in cold, winter weather. The cause of this falling off was several years ago ascribed by the then bishop to the fact that "there are so many Tom Paine men here." And I knew and know his expression was correct. As for legislating Bible religion into or out of any community or individual, the experiment has too long and too often proved a fruitless task, for > "Convince a man against his will,

> And he is unconverted still."

To send out Christian reverends with their Bibles here would be worse than useless. An Orson Pratt (the ablest Mormon apostle) would not hav been necessary to come out victorious in the debate with the Rev. Dr. Newman upon the question whether the Bible sanctions polygamy or not, for anybody conversant with the book would hav more than matched the doctor.

The Mormons say that Jehovah has talked this matter over with Joseph Smith; and did he (Jehovah) not talk, and often upon similar topics, in former days? Certainly. And is he not the same as he was four thousand years ago? Ye Christians, answer.

A Methodist Minister's Heresy.

From the New York Sun.

A very intelligent New Haven Methodist writes to us at length with regard to the views of the Rev. Dr. Curry touching the scriptures, and more especially the Old Testament. Dr. Curry, it will be remembered, confessed that a great change had come over his mind with regard to the Bible, which he was disposed to now treat in a spirit of doubt and criticism rather than with the reverential faith with which he formerly approached its pages.

These sentiments, our correspondent very truly says, do not represent the position occupied by the Methodist church, but he suggests that Dr. Curry may hav spoken in haste and heat and without having made "a deliberate, thoughtful study of the field." "I still cherish the hope," he says further, "that there is some misunderstanding which can be explained with honor to all."

It seems to us, however, that it is useless to cherish any hope of that sort. What Dr. Curry said was taken down by a stenographer, and it was so plain and positiv that there is no possibility of a misunderstanding with regard to it. Moreover the sentiments were uttered by a man who stands at the head of Methodist theologians, and who, presumably, had come to the conclusions he expressed only after a careful study of contemporary biblical criticism. If he at all deserves his reputation, it is an impertinence to assume, as our correspondent does, that he talked without a knowledge of his subject.

But, so assuming, our Methodist friend proceeds to try to help Dr. Curry out of his scrape by supposing "he really meant" this:

> "To enforce in strong language the truth that we are commanded to believe not on Methuselah or Nebuchadnezzar, but on our Lord Jesus Christ; that the Old Testament must find its support and glory in the New, and that it is unwise to pin our faith on the mummy sleeve of a remote past when the myriad voices of the living present are calling upon the church to arise and stand forth as the light of the world and the salt of the earth. This, I think, is the actual position of the working masses of the Methodist church. In their zeal for the acceptance of Christ as a present savior, and in their earnest expectation of a blissful immortality, they may not draw so tightly the cords of doctrinal and historical orthodoxy; but I am confident that the great body of the church is sincere, and that they hav no esoteric doctrins which they are ashamed or afraid to proclaim."

If Dr. Curry does not know how to say what he means, and treats so important and grave a subject as the authenticity and authority of the scriptures with carelessness and thoughtlessness, we are surprised that the Methodists, at their general conference, made him the editor of the review which expresses their most serious and deliberate thought. But, of course, he knew what he was talking about, and what he said was the result of the same kind of study and the same reading which hav led so many other theologians to the conclusions he declared in unmistakable language. The track he had been traveling is well beaten, and very familiar to those who hav kept up with the march of modern religious skepticism.

Nor is there any use in attempting to reconcile views like those of Dr. Curry and the Rev. Heber Newton with the creeds and doctrins of Christian theology. The two are utterly antagonistic. If you take away perfect faith and substitute reason, the supernatural basis of the church is gone; there is nothing left for it to stand upon except a code of morals not peculiar to it.

Testing the Candidates.

From the New Thought.

The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has written a letter to both James G. Blaine and Benjamin F. Butler, asking each of them to commit himself fairly on the proposed amendment to the United States Constitution. He asks each of them, if elected, to in their inaugural or in a message to Congress recommend an amendment to the Constitution, "that neither Congress nor any state shall make any laws respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the exercise thereof, or permitting in any degree a union of church and state, or granting any special privilege to any religious body, or taxing the people of any state either directly or indirectly for the support of any sect or religious body." Or "that no religious test shall ever be required of anybody as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification for office; that no person shall be deprived of the privilege of testifying in courts of justice in consequence of religious opinions. That neither the United States, or states, territories, or municipalities shall be permitted to make any gift, grant, or appropriation to any church, sect, or faith."

The above is simply a condensation of the principal points of a very able and quite lengthy letter. Of course, neither candidate will pay any attention to it. There are other worse enemies—enemies of more power before the people to-day than the churches, and the candidate who brings that issue into the came paign would lose more than he could possibly gain.

While we do not ask a president to propose the above amendments to the Constitution, we would not vote for one who was opposed to them; and while there is a small party of bigots in the United States threatening our liberty, it is well that the other side claim a hearing. This move on the part of Mr. Macdonald, if it does not set the candidates to thinking, will make others think. It will open up new questions for discussion, and thus, though it is doubtful whether it will change a single vote, it will stimulate thought in the right direction, and is, therefore, a good move.

If the political campaign can be made an occasion for showing how much money this professedly secular nation is even now wasting on chaplains, in Congress, legislatures, armies, and prisons, it will be a good work. The government of Russia kept a bear at public expense for many years. It was supposed the government would go to pieces without a real live governmental bear. But a government bear happened to die just when another one could not be procured to take its place. The government somehow managed to get along without it. So it was learned that the bear was a needless expense and it was abolished.

Our costly bear is the religious services in Congress, legislatures, prisons, asylums, and armies.

A Case of Constructiv Insult.

M. Labeau, the sexton of the Catholic church of St. Laurent, in Montreal, had an old grudge against a Mr. Turcotte, a prominent member of the congregation. He wished to insult him, and he took a novel method of doing it. One Sunday while he was taking up a collection he omitted to present his enemy with the plate, although the latter had his money in his hand. The sexton passed him by with a contemptuous glance, and Mr. Turcotte was obliged to put his money back again into his pocket. However, he determined to get even with the sexton. For having thus "wickedly and deliberately" omitted to present him with the plate, he sued him and laid his damages at $190. The case was tried before the Superior Court of Montreal, and resulted in a judgment against the wicked sexton, who was compelled to pay over to Mr. Turcotte the sum of five dollars to indemnify him for the injury he had caused.

Facts and Fallacies in Regard to the New Testament.

When and where do saints obtain their reward? The main dependence of Christians to establish their pet dogma of the immortality of the soul is the record in Luke xvi, 19–31.

This scripture is either parable or recital of facts. It cannot be part parable and part fact. It is alleged it must be recital of facts because it commences with the positiv assertion: "There was a certain rich man," etc. But the by-all-acknowledged parable of the unjust steward in the same chapter commences with the same words: "There was a certain rich man," etc., verse 1.

Parables are allegories. Christ explains this in the parable of the "Wheat and the Tares" (Matt. xiii, 24–40). He says: "The sower is the son of man; the field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; the tares, children of the wicked one; the enemy that sowed them, the devil; the harvest, the end of the world; the reapers are the angels." If Rich Man and Lazarus is a parable, Rich Man does not mean a rich man, or Lazarus a beggar, but are taken to represent something else. "Without a parable spake he not unto them" (Matt. xiii, 34). Thus the going to heaven or hell at death theory is left without a text to sustain it.

Some, in despair, at lack of all scripture to uphold their chief and darling dogma, insist it is not parable, but recital of facts. Even allowing this, we hav already shown there is not one word about righteous or wicked, good or bad, saint or sinner. It simply says: "The rich man was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day. The beggar named Lazarus was laid at his gate, full of sores." It does not even intimate that either possessed or lacked faith. It says no word of going to heaven. "And it came to pass that the beggar died and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom; the rich man also died and was buried" (Luke xvi, 22).

It is claimed "Abraham's bosom" is heaven, or means heaven. Where, in either Old or New Testament, is the text that justifies such an assertion? If it is relation of facts, then, indeed, it asserts all the beggars with sores go to Abraham's bosom. What a capacious bosom the old patriarch must hav!

Let us examin a few texts bearing on this point: "Looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved" (2 Peter iii, 12). If Abraham's bosom is heaven, then Abraham's bosom is to be on fire until it is dissolved. Then all the saints in heaven would need a drop of water to cool their tongues—quite as much as the rich man. When Abraham's bosom is on fire, would not that make hell for all the saints?—to say nothing of being exceedingly uncomfortable for the old gentleman himself. "Nevertheless, we, according to his promis, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (2 Peter iii, 13). Beggars and all other saints who go to heaven will find it hell at last, "for the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved." In all seriousness we call attention to the Bible declaration, "Heaven, the host of angels—all in heaven—shall be dissolved in fire." "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig-tree" (Isa. xxxiv, 4). This fire is to be ignited by God himself. "Looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire, shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat" (2 Peter iii, 12).

If the teaching of the church is true, that the righteous go to heaven at death, the Bible declares they will be burnt up, dissolved in fire, when the great and terrible day of the Lord comes.

If this scripture, rich man and Lazarus, is fact, how about verses 23 and 24? "And in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off and Lazarus in his bosom. And he cried, and said, Father Abraham, hav mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tips of his fingers in water, and cool my tongue, for I am tormented in this flame." This, if a recital of facts in regard to the condition of the righteous and wicked after death, teaches that those in heaven constantly witness the tortures and writhings of their dear loved ones in hell; listening to their shrieks of agony, their imprecations, and vain cries for mercy.

What ecstatic bliss, what perfect happiness, for a mother in heaven to daily and hourly witness the burning and horrible sufferings of her children! What a desirable heaven!

CHRIST'S COMFORT FOR MOURNERS

But, fact or parable, how can our Christian friends claim such interpretation of this scripture in support of a theory directly opposed to the plainest declarations of Christ and the New Testament?

At the grave of Lazarus, Jesus, desiring to comfort the sorrowing Martha, did not, after the manner of the modern parson, tell her, "Your brother is better off; do not weep for him, he has gone to heaven, is with the angels singing glad hosannahs around the throne of God." But he said, "Thy brother shall rise again." Surely Christians ought to be willing to admit Christ gave her the very best consolation possible. "Martha saith unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day" (John xi, 23, 24). Now, if Lazarus had gone to heaven, and the record declares he had been dead four days; if he was reveling in the joys of heaven, why did not Jesus correct her and comfort her with the information? Instead of this, he confirmed her in the theory that the only hope was in the resurrection.

"Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he liv" (25)—by and through the resurrection. "And whosoever liveth [until the last day, or day of resurrection, of which both were speaking] and believeth in me shall never die"—shall be translated—(1 Thess. iv, 16–18). Was death regarded as the door to glory by Jesus when he raised Lazarus? If so, how cruel for Christ to command him to come back from the realms of glory, to take off his wings, giv up his crown, resign his little harp, forsake the society and songs of angels, and return to this world of sin and sorrow!

Again, when the Sadducees who denied the resurrection came to Jesus and asked him if a woman had seven husbands, whose wife shall she be, not at death, but at the resurrection—"And the seven had her, and left no seed; last of all, the woman died also. In the resurrection, therefore, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of them, for the seven had her to wife? Jesus answered, When they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels which are in heaven" (Mark xii, 22–25). And Jesus calls attention to the utter unconsciousness of the dead, and because of that unconsciousness the necessity of a resurrection.

"And as touching the dead that they rise" (26, 27), he refers to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, whom they knew to be dead and buried. Now, as proof that they must hav a resurrection, and were not then alive or in heaven, Christ declares, "For God is not the God of the dead, but of the living.

Christ most positivly asserts none hath ever ascended up to heaven. "And no man hath ascended up to heaven but he that came down from heaven, even the son of man which is in heaven" (John iii, 13). Speaking to his disciples in regard to going to his father in heaven, he declared even his disciples, not even the beloved John, could go to heaven. "Little children, yet a little while I am with you, ye shall seek me, and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go ye cannot come; so now I say to you" (John xiii, 33).

David is indorsed as a perfect saint both in the Old and the New Testaments. "Because David did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, and turned not aside from anything that he commanded him all the days of his life, save only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite" (1 Kings xv, 5). "And when he had removed him, he raised up unto them David to be their king; to whom also he gave testimony, and said, I hav found David, the son of Jessie, a man after mine own heart, which shall fulfil all my will" (Acts xiii, 22). Certainly if any one ever ascended into heaven at death, David did. Yet the inspired Peter, on the day of Pentecost, especially inspired in his utterances by the Holy Ghost, declared: "Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulcher is with us unto this day." "For David is not ascended into the heavens" (Acts ii, 29, 34). Paul indorses this declaration: "For David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers, and saw corruption" (Acts xiii, 36). All the teaching of Paul is to the same effect: "For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised; your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished" (1 Cor. xv, 16–18). If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain. How could this be, if faith in Christ would insure going to heaven at death? What matter to them if their immortal soul, the real man, the conscious entity, was enjoying the delights of heaven? What need they care about the body if their faith would insure their soul's salvation?

"Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." How could David hav perished if his soul went to heaven at death? But the Bible positivly declares he had not ascended into heaven. Like Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and all the rest of the saints, they must lie unconscious in the grave till the resurrection.

Paul taught this in regard to himself and all the saintly Christians: "If after the manner of men I hav fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me if the dead rise not? let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die" (1 Cor. xv, 32). A modern priest or minister would roll up his eyes in mingled astonishment and horror. What advantageth you, Paul? Much every way. Don't you know at death you go at once to heaven? No matter, then, resurrection or no resurrection, you are sure of dwelling with Jesus and the angels in heaven. But Paul knew nothing of this theory. Speaking of comforting those who are mourning over the death of dear loved ones, he declares: "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words" (1 Thess. iv, 15–18). Not at death, but at the resurrection, Paul claims Christians hav hope of heaven. Learned doctors of divinity tell us that our soul is part of God, and therefore must be immortal. Even the souls of the wicked must liv forever—in everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.

It is by all admitted that a vast number more wicked than good people die. If wicked souls go to hell, then the greater part of God is in hell. Christian friends, do you believe your own doctrin? Does God send the biggest part of himself to hell for the devil to roast and torture, thus triumphing over God?

Can any being be God, and be unjust? Impossible; for the moment it is proved a God is unjust, that moment he is dethroned. It must be admitted by the most bigoted worshiper of Jehovah that none of us were consulted in regard to the time or epoch in which we liv in this world.

Let us suppose a case. A man lived a hundred years ago; he lived a most exemplary, earnest, devout Christian life. At the age of sixty he happened to be presented with a copy of Mr. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason." He read, thought, reasoned, and of necessity lost faith in Bible inspiration and church creed, while thus disbelieving died, and was damned (the loving, pitying Jesus declares, "He that believeth not shall be damned"), goes to hell, where there is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth.

To-day a man sixty years old dies, who has been an unprincipled, degraded wretch, living a vile life of brutality and sensuality. He dies and goes to hell. Where is the justice? Why should the good, pure, noble man, whose only offense was the exercise of his reason in regard to religious matters a few days before death—why should he hav to endure one hundred years more of hell, torture, and burning than the miserable wretch who died to-day?

On the other hand, a man died in the faith a hundred years ago (to avoid any quibble about his going to heaven, since every one of the thousand and one denominations claim they alone are God's chosen and peculiar people, we will send by the all-acknowledged, sure, safe, lightning express, with free pass, baggage permit checked through, infallible, direct route, bee line to the arms of Jesus and the eternal realms of glory); he lived a miserable life of drunkenness, vice, and crime, ending with the brutal murder of his wife, three children, and aged mother. On the scaffold he would, after the usual custom, assure the spectators that "he rejoiced in the love of Jesus; he was willing to die, for he was going to his blessed savior, who had paid it all, all the debt he owed; he had but one regret, as he is about to be borne by the holy angels to the bosom of his blessed savior, and dwell forever in the joys of heaven—that his wife, his little children, and his poor old mother, could never meet him in heaven; they had died in their sins, without one prayer, and in the mercy and love of his dear heavenly father they were doomed to eternal hell. But he hoped to meet all who had been so kind to him since his arrest, those dear sisters in Christ who had been so loving in 'tending him in the cell, bringing him choice flowers and delicacies; the holy and reverend gentlemen who had led him to Jesus, and the sheriff who had so indulged him in all he asked for. Blessed Jesus, holy savior, I come to thee!"

And the sheriff, per the hempen cravat line, swings him straight into the arms of Jesus.

A man of great benevolence, practical piety, a benefactor of his race, dies to-day. He, too, goes to heaven.

Why should the miserable criminal who only complied with the conditions by fear of the scaffold hav one hundred years more of the joys of heaven than the good and noble man, who lived a long life of virtue and benevolence?

The Government Has too Much Power Already.

Would it not be a good idea to make our state free school system a national system, and in this way get a free school system in all and each state? Also make it entirely free from all kinds of sectarianism? Compel parents and guardians to send their children, of school age, a certain number of weeks or months to these schools? In this way the nation could assist to furnish the means to aid the state to educate into science. Leave the sects religiously to teach their doctrins independent of our national free schools. By teaching the sciences the nation would be putting the minds of the next generation on guard against error in all forms, be it Roman Catholic, or Mormon, or orthodox, or any other.

The next generation would hav scientific truth as a basis to reason from, and be better able to keep clear of error in any and every form. Is this not the only remedy from all the dangers to this nation as a nation?

I put this thought to the well wisher of the good of this nation, and ask the question, Am I right?

MUSCLE, NOT MAGNETISM.

From the New York Sun of the 9th inst.

Wallack's Theater opened at half past seven o'clock last evening, but long before that hour a great crowd of persons had gathered on the steps. At half past eight o'clock the curtain and the lights went up together, and the slim young man who discoursed so sensibly the night before did the same thing again.

Behind the young man, and far back on the stage, sat a tall, hearty-looking young woman, all in black with the exception of her cheeks, which were red, and her hands, which were very white and large. When the young man got through speaking on his own account he introduced the young lady in black as the Wonder, and invited any gentleman among the spectators to come on the stage and see what she could do. A dozen men accepted the offer, and all the performances of Monday evening were repeated, even to the piano, which played exactly the same tune.

The biggest man on the stage was invited to come out and hold an umbrella over the young lady's head. He did so. He was then told to hold one hand in front of his face, so that the umbrella wouldn't hit him. That he also did. Then the Wonder put the palm of her hand against the umbrella, and the slim man told the big man not to let the umbrella move. But it did move, and so did the big man and the Wonder. When a whirlwind of evolutions around the stage had calmed down, the umbrella was turned inside out and otherwise wrecked, and the big man and the Georgia Wonder were both very red in the face and perspiring freely. The big man was satisfied, and went away, while others tried the powers of the Wonder one after another, all with the same result. None could hold the umbrella still, but all, when they retired to the rear of the stage, agreed that there was no magnetism about the Wonder, but that there was a great deal of muscle. The spectators didn't hear these remarks, however, and stamped, whistled, and clapped in token of very great delight.

One young man, very blond, in a very blond suit, afforded the spectators especial delight. Not only was he pushed hither and thither at the will of the Wonder, but when she let go of him he spun round and round, as though he had sprung from the grasp of Miss Lulu into the vortex of a whirlwind. The more he spun around the more the spectators were delighted, but the gentlemen on the stage noticed that when he stopped spinning he smiled very sweetly, and they thought that he did not show enough agitation for a young man who had met a Georgia Wonder for the first time, and had passed through the experience of a dry leaf in a gale of wind. When several umbrellas, all alike, and all rather weak, had been eternally ruined, the Wonder passed to other exercises. A stout cane was given to a gentleman, and he held it with both hands in front of him, and about two feet apart, and was told not to move while Miss Lulu put the palm of one or both of her hands against the stick and used her magnetic power. The man tried not to move, but he couldn't help it. The next gentleman who tried the experiment was the one who had loaned the stick. He was thick set and very powerful, and although he had to move more or less, he moved very little, and when his experiment was concluded the Wonder showed signs of greater fatigue than he. A dozen others tried the cane experiment with varying results, all moving around more or less, but none very violently, with the exception of the original blond young man, who was as much affected by his endeavors to hold the cane as by his efforts to keep the umbrella from moving. He spun just as industriously for one experiment as for the other.

In the following experiments first one and then two men vainly endeavored to hold a billiard cue steady, and one after another succeeded, after a severe struggle, in forcing one end of the billiard cue to the floor. When this had been done for the third or fourth time, an old gentleman in the front row, with a red face, who had been breathing hard and trying to make the top of his head smoother with a silk handkerchief, concluded that he had solved the mystery. He arose and said impressivly: "She's got electricity stored in her shoes. I want her to take off her shoes and stockings, and then we'll see how she does it." The red-faced man smiled a satisfied smile, as though he had solved the problem, but the slim man in the swallow-tailed suit did not agree with him, and said kindly: "I'm sorry, sir, but the young lady does not take off her shoes and stockings on the stage."

The spectators laughed, while Miss Lulu looked daggers at the man who had hinted that her shoes were big enough to conceal electric batteries. A young man on the stage, inspired by the elder one's example, got up a theory of his own, and announced in a loud voice that the stage was charged with electricity, and he could feel it in the bones of his feet. His idea won little favor, and he sat down and kept his feet off the floor. The packed house had become impatient and showed anxiety for more wonders, so Miss Hurst continued her exhibition. The largest man left on the stage, and several others after him, held a chair in their arms and tried vainly to keep themselves and it from moving around the stage when Miss Lulu wanted them to do so. After that she held the chair, and as many as could get a hold of it tried to force it to the floor, but had the greatest difficulty in doing so. Thus ended the peaceful half of the show.

The chair was put well in front on the stage, and Miss Lulu twirled it around and around with her hands. Several gentlemen sat on the chair, and she threw them out of it without apparent effort. A tall gentleman, with a pink in his coat lapel, had been on the stage from the first, and had been among the most unsuccessful in his efforts to defeat the wonder. The man who felt electricity in his feet even accused him of being an accomplice. But he was not. When the third or fourth gentleman had been thrown from the chair he walked to the edge of the stage, and, while trembling with excitement, said:

"This whole business is a fraud from beginning to end. Anybody here can do anything that she has done. I can do all these tricks myself. Why don't she hold a cane still, or press a chair to the floor, if she has this wonderful power? I'll hold the chair and let her try it."

The tall man tried to say more, but everybody was yelling at once. The slim man was screaming in his ear and waving his arms, and the very blond man began to look dangerous. For at least five minutes a perfect uproar reigned. Everybody who had a voice used it, and Miss Lulu alone stood calm and self-possessed, in the midst of a wild uproar, in which everybody yelled, whistled, stamped, shouted, and groaned, and which seemed calculated to shake the nerves of an unsophisticated Georgia girl. Finally the slim young man, whose shirt front was now ruined, and whose hair was tumbled, succeeded in obtaining a moment's silence.

"I wish," said he, in a voice that seemed rather nervous, "that the audience would tell me what they want."

The audience was entirely willing, and did so for five minutes more. The only words the slim young man could distinguish were "dude," "chair," "cane," and, "Sling her out." Then the tall man, who had become calm, and who proved to be Dr. W. E. Forrest, began to speak. Nobody heard him, but at the end a fat man was sitting in the chair, and the doctor was getting ready to do what the Wonder had done. He did it. He put both hands against the sides of the chair. The one toward the spectators was passiv and idle, as had been that of the Wonder, but the other, not in sight, grasped the chair with a firm grip, and with great ease threw the fat man on the floor just as Miss Lulu's right hand had done. Then the crowd yelled more, and the slim man made a motion to retreat, but was prevented by the men on the stage. He walked dejectedly back and said, "Let him hold a chair and keep men from forcing it to the floor." A man in the balcony constituted himself umpire, and said everything must be fair, and the tall man must grab the chair the way the girl did. When he had done so, half a dozen men, including the slim one, pitched for the chair, but could not force it to the floor. When the crowd came to for the last time the lights were turned down, and the Georgia Wonder, the slim young man, and the very blond young man had disappeared.

While some were looking for them, others had a little riot on the stage. The doctor received an ovation from admirers who pressed around him to congratulate him. A man who was variously called "Wright" and "Sanford" by the crowd around him menaced the doctor and called him hard names. The doctor, no match for him physically, stood up like a man, and the crowd backed him vociferously. The man called "Wright" and "Sanford" did not last as long as the Wonder. He disappeared suddenly.

The following is the explanation of one of our correspondents, resident in Georgia, of the modus operandi of Miss Hurst. It appeared in the Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle:

EDITORS CHRONICLE: Credulity is like jealousy; it "doth make the meat it feeds upon."

By the papers I see that Miss Hurst has fallen into the hands of the doctors, and has completely captivated them. They seem to be astonished at her ability and acknowledge that she has wonderful "occult force." I am sure I hav no objection to whatever subtle power Miss Hurst may possess. But are the doctors sure that she has the "magnetism" or "force" attributed to her, which they detected?

The idea has gone out that Dr. Rains and others made a test of her "psychic" force, and seemed to be convinced that she had the marvelous power, by the mere touch of her hands, to hold up a chair, overcoming the efforts of two or three men to put it to the floor. But it appears it did not occur to the doctors and the lawyer to reverse the order of things, and let two or even one man hold the chair and request Miss Hurst to put it to the floor by all the "psychic force" she may possess. It may seem strange to those who hav never tried it, but almost any lady can hold a chair in her hands and successfully resist the efforts of two men to put it down to the floor.

The feat of swaying a stout man about, and pushing him down on the stage, to the astonishment of "skeptics" and delight of the believers, while he is holding with both hands a chair firmly pressed to his breast, which has given Miss Hurst such renown, any girl twelve years old can do, as can be readily demonstrated. The explanation is this: Let a stout man, for instance, hold a chair, grasping the front part, the post with both hands, firmly pressing the back of it to his breast; then let the "magnetizer" put the palms of the hands upon the bottom of the chair and gently press with a slight swaying motion until the person is thrown off his equilibrium; then put one hand, just the palm if you wish, on the back of the chair, and turn the person around, or sway him from side to side, and if he holds on to the chair he will soon fall. His struggling is to maintain his balance, which the holding of the chair prevents. Generally the bewildered man throws the chair away to keep from breaking his neck, and converts all the skeptics. Very little force, when adroitly applied, is required to do this. No electric power nor magnetism is concerned in it. Some persons are much more easily thrown about than others.

The umbrella trick which astonished the lawyers and doctors and made a "cyclone" of the lawyer's umbrella, as the astonished reporter stated, is a very simple thing. Any little girl ten years old can produce such a "Burke county cyclone" with the umbrella as described at the meeting of the doctors. The modus operandi is this: Place an open umbrella over any little girl or young lady and a man, and let her slip her hands over the staff, to electrify it, if you please, then suddenly flirt it up, always requesting the person under the umbrella with you to catch it and hold it down when it starts up. As soon as the person lays hold of it, the operator must suddenlg jerk it down over both of their heads, and tangle it up in the hair of the head. Then she must fumble about awhile to disengage it, and as soon as it is partially free (never mind the fellow's eye) suddenly thrust it over the heads of the wonder-struck bystanders, whose duty is to seize it as it flies. In the scramble it soon breaks into pieces. The more that pull at it the better the marvel. I hav performed this "prodigy" repeatedly. It requires no "odylic force" to cause an umbrella to break in pieces, if a crowd of men pull at it.

The whirling of a chair by putting the palms of the hands on the hind posts is very easily accomplished. A very little practice will make anyone expert in it. After sliding the palms of the hands over the post, the chair leaning a little, a slight twitch of the muscles will turn it over. There is no magnetism about it, or necessary. The fact is, the occult power or force attributed to, or claimed by, certain individuals exists in the credulity of the spectators. Now, I do not pretend to say that Miss Lulu Hurst claims any "occult force" in doing what she does so well.

However, discussions of this character, about the marvelous, the magnetic, or electric power of certain individuals, remind me of the wrangle over a proposition a certain king submitted to the savants of France. Of course the king's question had to be discussed. It was this: "Take a given number of pounds of water, add to it a live fish, and the weight would not be increased." The doctors disputed over the singular phenomenon for several days without arriving at any satisfactory solution of the paradox. At this crisis a wag suggested: "Suppose we test the matter." The water and the fish were carefully weighed, and the discussion was suddenly closed.

FIAT JUSTITIA.

MORE QUEER WOMEN IN GEORGIA.

From the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution.

Georgia is winning a great reputation abroad as being the home of electric women. The manifestations of Miss Lulu Hurst are now puzzling Northern audiences. Then Miss Mattie Lee Price, living not more than ten miles from the home of Miss Hurst, developed the same mysterious power, and has also gone abroad to illustrate the new type of Georgia womanhood. Now a third and more remarkable case has developed in Atlanta, the lady being Mrs. C. F. Coleman, the wife of the superintendent of the Atlanta cotton factory, and a lady of great worth. Mrs. Coleman had seen the wonderful Lulu when she was in this city, and her husband had felt her peculiar and inexplicable power. About ten days ago Mrs. Coleman accidentally ascertained that a chair would yield to her touch and twist in any direction at her will without the use of muscular power. She imparted the knowledge to her husband, and repeated trials were made. These trials only strengthened Mrs. Coleman's power, and convinced her husband that she could repeat Lulu Hurst's freaks. Mrs. Coleman made the discovery known to her friends, and last night quite a number of invited guests assembled in the Young Men's Christian Association rooms to witness her first public manifestation of the strange power. Mrs. Colman was, at first, somewhat embarrassed, but as she proceeded with her task she became calm, and succeeded in everything she undertook. A stick held by Mr. Scott and Mr. Kimball was made to pass round freely, despite strenuous efforts to hold it still. One of the gentlemen was compelled, very much against his will, to giv up a pleasant chair in which he was sitting, the chair turning over and throwing him out, while a table was raised almost entirely from the floor simply by Mrs. Colman holding her hands upon it. The masterpiece was performed when Mrs. Coleman took a walking cane in her hand. She held one end, and by simply touching the other end to the edge of the table made the table stand on two legs only. During the entire entertainment the gentlemen present watched closely, but could detect nothing resembling trickery. They all declared that the lady's power was something wonderful, and while all said that she was equal to Lulu Hurst, some declared she excelled her. Mrs. Coleman is at the same loss as Miss Hurst was to account for the power she commands.

Going to the Show.

"Oh, dear! it has been the longest day I ever knew," said a lady to me this evening (Sunday).

"Well, you should hav gone to church," was my reply. "There were three special attractions and several minor ones there. First, there was the white negro lady from Frankfort. She was not only the fairest but one of the best dressed women in church. She came in with a coal-black negro and sat in the negro gallery, looking like an angel in a crowd of troglodytes.

"Then there was the daughter of our merchant prince, just home from her commencement, and dressed in pure white, with an exquisit 'love of a bonnet' and other feminin fixings to match.

"The third attraction was the presence of Mrs. Hall, the daughter of one of Snowville's greatest preachers, and the wife of a noted evangelist; and she is also the whilom belle of our little village. She is just in from her St. Louis home to visit mother, sisters, and brothers, and other home friends. She was exquisitly dressed in peacock-blue silk, and was the center of all eyes.

"Then there were several minor attractions—a lady with a long white plume; another dressed this way; and another just the reverse."

"Yes, but what of the men?"

"Oh, nothing of note, only Mr. P. had a ripe apple with which he was taunting some of the girls till one of them finally snatched it from him."

"And the preaching?"

"Well, the expected stranger failed to put in an appearance, so Dr. B. gave us a short sermon—nothing new, though."

It seems from all I can gather that the "going to church" of the present group here convened amounts to a view of female loveliness enhanced by beautiful dress goods and lovely millinery, and as I've no curiosity in that line, and I've heard "you 'uns" all describe the show, I hav been a gainer by remaining at home, for I've written several articles for the press, and half a dozen letters, and this afternoon Mr. S. and I took a long walk to Graysentown to call upon a friend. I enjoyed every step of the walk around the mountain path, through green lanes and grassy fields strewn with ripe dewberries and with oxeye daisies laughing cheerily at us and inviting us to gather a wild-flower bouquet for the mantel vases at home as a reminder of the Sunday's outing.

A Nomination for Secretary.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Believing that the declination of the office of secretary of the National Liberal League by Mr. T. C. Leland is more sincere than the recent declination of Mr. Samuel J. Tilden, and considering that nominations for the place he will leave are now in order, I would like to suggest for the next secretary of the League Mr. Charles B. Reynolds, of North Parma, N. Y. I make this nomination knowing the earnestness of Mr. Reynolds, and believing that the labor of the position would not be a hindrance, but rather an advantage to him in the prosecution of the work he has chosen for himself. I can see how the work of secretary could be very advantageously combined with that of Liberal lecturer, and Mr. Reynolds is the man above all others within the range of my observation who could be relied upon to run the mill effectivly and well.

☞WE wish that our subscribers who are in arrears would make a special effort to pay up. During the summer months our book sales are small, and we hav to depend upon the subscriptions coming in to pay expenses, which are just as heavy now as ever. We know that business generally is dull, that "times are hard," but the amounts are so small individually that it would seem no one can be inconvenienced by paying his dues, while in the aggregate they foot up large, and mean everything to us. It is unpleasant to us to dun our friends, and money is never asked for till imperativly needed; now we must hav it to pay bills with. A good many hundreds of dollars are due on subscriptions, so we are not asking a favor, but simple justice and square dealing between friends.

The League.

The point made by Mr. Putnam in last week's issue, that the president and secretary elected at the coming Congress of the National Liberal League giv their undivided attention to the affairs of the League, is well taken. These officers, at any rate, should go into the field and labor unremittingly for the advancement of organization. By doing this they can undoubtedly build up the League to represent in some degree the expanding forces of Freethought The Investigator, also, seems to think this should be done. Because he is not able to take the stump, to go among the people and help them form strong auxiliaries, the old veteran, Horace Seaver, declines to be a candidate for the presidency. He is obliged to us, he says, for our courtesy in nominating him, but he "objects to the nomination as entirely unfit, for if elected we [Mr. Seaver] would not be able to attend to the duties of the office, and that is a sufficient reason for declining it." Mr. Seaver adds it is his opinion that "a more activ, enterprising, and a younger man should be chosen," and he names as among those suitable for the energetic prosecution of the League's business Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, Mr. John E. Remsburg, Mr. W. S. Bell, Mr. H. L. Green, Mr. George Chainey, Mr. Walter C. Wright, Dr. J. L. York, or the Hon. A. B. Bradford. Either of these gentlemen would suit THE TRUTH SEEKER, but an exceptionally good nomination was that made by Mr. Putnam—his friend, George Chainey. Mr. Putnam himself is our first choice, for we know him to be a good man. He is enthusiastic, industrious, economical of resources, and possesses executiv abilities of a very high order. Without his labors—rendered gratuitously, in season and out of season—the fine meetings we hav held in New York the past winter would hav been impossible. We still stick to him for first choice; but as he has nominated Mr. Chainey in his place, we defer to his wishes, but suggest that the ticket be:

For President,
GEORGE CHAINEY,
of Boston;

For Secretary,
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM,
of New York.

With both of these gentlemen in the field, working for all they are worth, we think the number of good live auxiliaries could be doubled. Mr. Chainey is as eloquently persuasiv a speaker as we hav; Mr. Putnam is second to only Chainey, besides being a harder worker. We think they would make a strong team, and we move they be given a trial. Several attacks on legally entrenched orthodoxy hav been made the past year, such as Mr. Moore's suit against the school authorities of Bloomfield, Iowa, the attempt to repeal the legal discrimination against Atheists in Masschusetts, and the decision of Supt. Ruggles against the Bible in the schools in this state, which will hav to be enforced through suits of interested parents, but we hav heard nothing about the National Liberal League being in any way in any of them. This is not right, for the League was formed expressly to help fight such cases; but Abbot's example of shirking has been followed by the present officers, not from lack of interest in the cases, but from lack of ability to adequately aid the suers for equal rights. What we think desirable to see is something done, some tangible reason put forth for supporting the organization. At the coming Congress we hope to see some steps taken to put the organization on a working basis; let the members raise funds for the National League to use, or do the work themselvs. The auxiliaries can help the National officers by getting up lectures, social meetings, or concerts which will pay a few dollars each, and in this way a fund can gradually be gathered. The present officers hav been unable to do anything for lack of means. The responsibility for this rests with the Liberals of the whole country, and upon them, it seems to us, the responsibility for the League's future existence must continue to rest. If they take hold earnestly, much can be done; if they do not, nothing. The League may hav the best officers in the world, but unless backed up their official existence is practically useless.

We do not say this in any spirit of fault-finding. The present management has done all it could with the means at command. But the point we argue is this: If the League at the next Congress cannot take steps to command more means of action; cannot draw to its support men and women willing to work for its objects, it might as well be disbanded as a National organization, and the auxiliaries be converted into such Liberal clubs as their members prefer.

The Catholic Church and the French Government.

The people of France can be divided into two religious classes—the Atheistic and Catholic. Since Calvin's time Protestantism has not had an extended nor strong hold upon Europe outside of Germany, and the Fatherland is not a conquest of which the Protestants can boast. German scholarship is synonymous with Rationalism, and has largely affected the whole world. The Atheistical population of France comprises the educated and governing class; the pope of Rome holds the peasantry and unlettered workmen. The church is yet subsidized from the national treasury, but this is done as a measure of policy, and not from love of the church, or with intent to benefit her.

The influence of the Vatican upon the French government is small, and apparently growing smaller. Measures intended to deprive the church of all her privileges will probably be advanced at an early date. The situation, as stated by M. Paul Bert in a London review, is bad for Rome. The government is in the hands of Radicals who hav no respect for religious pretensions. The Radicals are, however, divided as to the best method of rendering nugatory the Catholic power. One party, led by M. Paul Bert and M. Ferry, are in favor of continuing the present relations of the state and church, as "from one point of view a state church is a crippled church, the government stipends being at once a prop and a gag." M. Paul Bert, who was formerly Minister of Public Instruction and Worship, is, says a Protestant journal, an astute and dangerous enemy of Rome. It is enmity and not friendship that leads him to advocate the retention of the Concordat. He would continue to pay the salaries of the priests that he may control them, but he would enforce rigidly the terms of the contract. This agreement was made in 1801 between the pope and Bonaparte, and adopted by the French Chambers in the following year. By this convention, known as the Concordat, the French government bound itself to support only the bishops, whose number was reduced to 51, and the curés, or established rectors of important parishes, of whom there are only about 2,500 in all France. It did not agree to pay the incumbents licensed by bishops, who officiate in the rural parishes, and form the great majority of the working clergy. The first grant for Catholic worship made in pursuance of the Concordat did not reach $400,000. The state also reserved the right of nominating the bishops, who in turn were to nominate the curés, but the latter could not officiate without government approval. Neither does the Concordat make mention of religious associations, all of which had been prohibited in 1792, but some of which hav during the present century been recognized by legislativ or administrativ ordinances.

Considering how the triumph of M. Paul Bert's wing of the Radicals would affect the church, a paper not particularly friendly to Agnostics says:

"We can understand, then, why Catholics feel no special gratitude to M. Paul Bert for announcing himself as a champion of the Concordat. That instrument in her hands would become a Shylock's bond, and be used to bring about a widely different relation from that which, in spite of recent changes, still subsists between the state and the church in France. He would giv to Catholicism nothing which is not called for by the strict letter of the contract, and he would press to the uttermost all the concessions that can be turned against it. Now, there is no doubt that if the contract wrung from the papacy by the first consul were to be construed by an implacable enemy, the little finger of Paul Bert would prove thicker than Bismarck's loins, and whereas German Protestants had scourged the Roman church with whips, French Agnostics would chastise it with scorpions."

The opposition to Bert is led by M. Clemenceau. His plans are to abolish the Concordat, and hav the state deny "not only support, but every species of recognition to all religions organizations." The criticism passed upon this course by M. Bert and his followers is that it would giv the church more power than she now possesses. The clergy, they say, would artfully construe it as persecution, and, laying this view of it before the ignorant and superstitious peasants who form the bulk of the Catholic strength, embitter them against the government to an extent sufficient, perhaps, to change the complexion of the government at succeeding elections. The opponents of M. Clemenceau regard it as certain that the clergy could, in such a case, wring more money from their dupes than they now receive from both the government and the people.

There is, of course, much truth in this. M. Paul Bert may be a more dangerous enemy to Rome than M. Clemenceau and his method better calculated to keep the church under. But that is a narrow and sectarian way of looking at the matter, and justifiable only as a matter of political policy. The Catholics in the past hav committed the grossest and most inhuman outrages upon the liberty of the people, and there is no reason for supposing that the church has lost the will to still further curtail the rights of the individual; but after all, for the honor of humanity, for the credit of the great and growing body of Freethinkers, not alone in France, but the whole world, Agnostics in power should do what is right, even if not the most expedient. Church and state should be totally and eternally separated. The errors of the past should be rectified as speedily as possible. A man has a natural right to be a fool, and if the Catholics can sustain their church in France without state aid, let them. But any compromise the state can make with them can be only a "league with death and covenant with hell," for a reversal of administration would enable the church to swell the "Worship budget" from the few millions of dollars now voted to as many millions as the country could stand without a revolution. The right way will, in the long run, prove to be the best statesmanship.

Giving in Marriage.

A recent refusal of a police justice of this city to perform the marriage ceremony, on the ground that he had no authority, has produced a ripple of excitement, and been the cause of a close examination of the statutes and precedents bearing upon the subject. With one exception the laws of this state are exceptionally clear and common-senseful. This exception is the provision allowing the solemnization of the rite by "ministers of the gospel." That the preachers hav this right can never be admitted by a Secularist. Giving power to them is a recognition of Christianity at variance with our national Constitution, and abhorrent to the sense of a secular community. The Revised Statutes, chapter viii, reads that marriage may be performed by "ministers of the gospel." What gospel? The gospel of Buddha? the gospel of Mohammed? the gospel of Mormon Joe Smith? Of course not; the gospel of Christ is meant. And this gospel of Christ is getting to be the abomination of this country. It obtrudes itself everywhere. It seeks to control everything. The minister of the gospel comes with the doctor at births, and stands at his side at the burials. Christianity is too ubiquitous. It runs the family, the school, and is trying to run the government. Our statutes recognize it in indirect ways, and with or without the citizen's consent, the "minister of the gospel" is an altogether too prominent personage in a great many of his affairs.

The officials authorized by the statutes of the state to ratify the marriage contract are "mayors, recorders, and aldermen of cities, justices, and judges of courts of record, judges of the city courts, and justices of the peace." These officials perform no "divine" services in marrying couples; their functions are similar to a notary public's in witnessing a signature and affixing his seal as an attestation that it is genuin.

The law upon the subject of marriage is essentially secular. All interpretations of it agree that the contract is civil, and the only formality necessary is the bona fide agreement of the parties, in the presence of witnesses, to enter into the relations of husband and wife.

New York, by thus holding, has done much to take power from the priests of the gospel and put it where it belongs—in the hands of the people. The recent decision of the United States District Court of Rhode Island, that such marriages are valid all over the country, adds to the value of the law as a precedent for other states that may throw off the grip of the "ministers of the gospel."

Persecution in Erie County.

When the League gets into fighting condition it will be in order for it to take hold of cases like this, as telegraphed from Erie, N. Y., July 9th. The dispatch reads:

"For haying one Sunday, to prevent certain destruction of cut hay from rain, Farmer James Sampson, of Fairview township, this county, was arrested to-day and held for trial under an ancient unrepealed statute. He is an Ingersoll follower, and when waited on by the committee from the church said he would stop work if they could convince him that God would save his property over Sunday."

Perhaps Mr. Sampson is fully able to hold his own alone against the forces of iniquity—otherwise known as the Christian church—but if he could hav aid and moral backing from outside it would render his little martyrdom more tolerable, and while the town is stirred up over the case if the League could flood the place with circulars and arguments against the retention of such laws on the statute books, sleeping Freethinkers could undoubtedly be found, and an auxiliary League perhaps be formed.

Such an outcome would teach the Christians to be mighty careful how they invaded a citizen's rights on the strength of a statute passed in the gloomy morning of the country's life.

THE Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., of Chautauqua, has faith in God, but intends to keep his powder dry. In the course of his splendid speech, delivered at Woodstock, Conn., July 4th, and printed in the Independent, he says:

"When man forgets and forsakes some other possible hold, and trusts God in lieu of personal fidelity, he has as little right to find rest in his faith as hav captain and crew on a foggy sea when bridge and foremast are deserted, and the fog horn silent."

It has been ascertained by experiment, we believe, that with proper attention to details and appropriate safeguards, numerous difficulties hav been surmounted without any faith in God at all. On the other hand, many a ship has gone down and carried with it a large number of persons distinguished for their piety. The three missionary vessels named the Morning Star, lost in the Micronesian Islands, may perhaps hav been in the Rev. Mr. Vincent's mind when he spoke the words which we hav quoted.

THE committee appointed to revise the books of the Old Testament hav finished their task. When the result of their labors shall be given to the public it is supposed that we shall know exactly what the deity meant to say when he wrote the Bible. Whether the distinguished Author will be permitted to revise the manuscript, or whether corrected proofs of the same will be forwarded to him at his summer residence, is a secret of the press which has not been divulged. It is a melancholy fact that of the twenty-seven members of the Revision Committee, twelve hav died since the work began.

IN the Rev. Joseph Cook's Fourth of July oration, the following passage occurs:

"The ostrich buries her thin, wilful head in the sand, and thinks her whole body covered. In circles, only half educated in morals but aspiring, great is the American eagle, greater is the American peacock, and greatest is the American ostrich.'

What does that mean? Who is the American ostrich? Is it Cook?

SPEAKING of the weekly Sunday concerts in Central Park, this city, the Independent remarks, "We do not like it; but what can be done!" Why, do nothing, Brother Bowen. The attitude of a man who does not believe in a rational use of the day of rest should be characterized by a calm and studied inactivity.

"THE church first, then politics," says the Advocate. This is contrary to the spirit of the old adage, "Between two evils choose the least."

Lectures and Meetings,

JOHN E. REMSBURG, Liberal lecturer, of Atchison, Kan., will start East on a lecturing tour in August.

THE New England Spiritualist Camp-meeting Association will hold its Eleventh Annual Convocation at Lake Pleasant (Montague, Mass., on the Hoosac Tunnel route), from August 2d to August 31st next. Many prominent Spiritualist speakers will be in attendance. Amusements in the form of concerts, rink skating, parties, readings, and dancing will be afforded.

J. L. ANDREW, of Fort Scott, Kan., has made engagements to lecture in Illinois, beginning about the middle July. He will be pleased to hear from any Liberals or Liberal organization desiring his services. Mr. Andrews has made partial arrangements to lecture in Texas, and would like to correspond with those in that state in want of a Liberal lecturer, so that he may hav ample time for arranging details. His fees, he announces, will be reasonable. Mr. Andrews may be addressed at Fort Scott, Kan., in care of Professor D. D. Bryant.

"The Great Convention."

This is the year of conventions. All hearts and minds are full of them. Through them the leaders of the future are to be selected. Through their loud noises and harsh discords floats a sweet strain of music, promis of better days to come. Above the smoke and roar of battle shine stars of hope that tell us of peace, of purity and reform. For many days to come the country will be agitated with the strife and rivalry of opposing forces. The pessimist will see in all this nothing but weakness and insanity. The optimist will see in every torchlight procession human nature lighting its path to victory, and progress regenerating itself in the baptism of its own enthusiasm. The cause may seem to some unworthy. The difference between parties and candidates will no doubt be magnified out of proportion. Still while the majority can be so excited and drawn from private to public concerns, we should preserve our faith in the worth of our race.

But the great convention of the year is yet to be held. This convention will make but little noise. The papers, many of them, will think it unworthy of notice. Others that mention it will only sneer at it as a congress of cranks. And yet it will be in a true sense the greatest convention of the year. Its platform will hav more truth and less folly than all other platforms combined. Its triumph will bring more joy and truer prosperity to mankind than the success of any other party.

I need hardly say I mean the combined Convention of Freethinkers and National Liberal Leaguers to be held the first week in September, at Cassadaga Lake, N. Y. Here will gather the representativs of the only people who hav yet learned the meaning of liberty; who really both in word and deed wish to destroy every form of corruption and slavery, and extend to every other man, woman, and child the right each to be happy in their own way so long as they do not infringe upon the equal right of any one else. Here will come the men and women who are no longer captivs to the skies; who, instead of seeking through pain and self-denial to find happiness beyond the grave, hav learned how, through the truth of nature, to find heaven right here and now.

Through all the past the best devotion of humanity has been wasted upon the skies, consumed in useless smoke of sacrifice that has only smirched the bright firmament above us. Instead of this waste we would giv all that we hav to giv to the joy and comfort of living men and women. If there are Gods and angels, it is their bounden duty to serve and comfort us, not ours to serve them. The strong must help the weak. This world is ours. Let us possess it and enjoy it to the utmost. There is enough for all if no man wrong his brother. Half the money now thrown away on the skies, devoted to the needs of man, would make the light to shine into all darkness, and cause the flowers of health and comfort to blossom at every hearthstone. This is our gospel. How to carry the glad tidings to all is the great question.

Upon the essential principles of Liberalism we are all agreed. Being yet in our infancy, we are yet only finding out the best methods by experiment—like little children learning to walk, we hav stumbled along thus far by apparent failures. But each fall has taken us nearer the truth. It is not my purpose in this article to review the history of the National Liberal League. With all its mistakes, so-called, I am satisfied. Whatever has been done was done with good intentions. But the time has come for us to walk forward with more assurance and a firmer step. Thus far most that has been done has been provisional. But we are now entering upon the formativ period—from the laboratory of experiment emerges into light the bright crystal of concentration and definit purpose, sketched for us in last week's TRUTH SEEKER by our friend, Mr. Putnam. Excepting everything personal to myself, I wish to second with all my mind and heart the new departure therein proposed. I trust a much better man than the one he nominates may be found for president.

Mr. Wakeman, our retiring president, has several times asked me to consent to be nominated for the office.

For various reasons I hav thus far declined. If, however, the annual congress should take up the program laid down by Mr. Putnam, elect him as secretary, and pledge itself both in word and deed to support us in the field, I should not decline. But this can only be settled in convention.

In the mean time, let the whole field be surveyed. Let each one speak his mind freely and frankly. The bugaboo of Comstockism is so tattered and torn that it can no longer scare away even a blind bird. All ought to be equally satisfied by this time that anything beyond negativ political action can only disintegrate, instead of integrate. I hav traveled almost as much as any man in this work, mixing mostly with Liberals. It has been my business to study their wants. I hav corresponded with thousands. I am thoroughly convinced that the great need of all is live, activ men in the field, possessed of such personal gifts as shall giv them large audiences, who shall find it to be to their practical and immediate interest to promote organization and local activity. Lecturing as a private enterprise does good; still if the lecturer should speak as the representativ of a live and effectiv organization, his work would be far more productiv of good.

The first thing to be done by the Annual Congress is to put its principles into the most compact and fewest words, and to lay down a program of activ work; next to elect the two best men offered among our workers and speakers who can giv their whole time to the offices of president and secretary; last, but by no means least, fix upon a salary for each to be paid out of the money they raise. This salary may be made large enough to pay them in full for their services, or in part, leaving them free to make something by lecturing.

The successful missionary of a Liberal gospel can not travel far without scrip and purse. Tavern keepers and depot restauranteurs are not given to entertaining angels unawares. To command an audience needs a decent suit of clothes and a clean shirt, as well as an eloquent tongue. When the committee meets the lecturer at the depot his appearance must not make them want to hurry him down a back street to the hotel for fear the people will see him before the seeling hand of night hides the threadbare condition of his wardrobe.

I often see, and hear it stated, Liberals are poor. That, however, is false. I generally find among them many of the most prosperous people of the town.

There are a thousand professed Liberals in this country who could pay one hundred dollars each per year, and never miss it. Why don't they do it? Because they are stingy? No, not by any means. Simply because we hav not made it worth their while to do it. Meet in convention; put the right men in the field; let them show by their deeds what they can do; call for the money, and it can no more refuse to come than water can avoid running down hill. We all know that any promis of money to be paid to the officers of the League must be contingent on their ability to inspire the rich Liberals to giv it. Hence the men selected must hav faith in their own ability. The advantage of such recognition, however, by the Congress will be great. It says to the rich Liberals, "It is your duty to help the weak." It binds the officers of the League into a close relation with the organization. It makes their personal interests dependent on the development of the League. It will enable them when not otherwise engaged to say to the Liberals in towns unacquainted with their own strength, "Provide a hall and pay the actual expenses, and we will come and hold a meeting." I think that the president and secretary should spend six months of each year traveling together. Their combined official influence and speaking ability would giv to each meeting the character of a convention. In the course of the year they ought to speak at least in two hundred different towns. In such places where there is organization they should study its needs, giv advice and encouragement toward its greater development. Where there is none, they should do their best to start it. Occasional reports of their progress should be furnished to all the Liberal papers, so that the Liberals of the entire country may be cheered with the history of the progress and promotion of organization.

This is my advice to the coming Congress. It will be a great event, coming, as it will, in conjunction with the New York State Freethinkers' Convention. Let this discussion go on, so that from many minds we may gather up the scattered rays of wisdom and combine them into a torch that shall flash the light of freedom on.

Letters from Friends.

TO THE PEOPLE OF JAMESTOWN, OHIO.

I saw a letter from one of the good Christian citizens of Jamestown to a friend of his in the far West in reference to the Jamestown cyclone which occurred last April, in which he asks the question, "How did it happen that so few were killed and badly injured?" He then goes on to say that the general answer by the people of Jamestown is, "Intervention of providence." Suppose we examin this specious answer a little and see if it is satisfactory to all the people of Jamestown. If God intervened to save the lives and property of some, he purposely destroyed the lives and property of others. This is not only logically but actually true. What a comfort it will be to those who hav lost relativs, friends, and property to be told that God in his infinit wisdom and goodness has seen fit to take from them their dearest treasures, especially to those poor widows who hav lost all their earthly goods! What consolation it must be! And yet I will venture to assert that if those who were killed had funeral sermons preached for them, something very similar to what I hav just said was preached, and in all probability in the same sermon they were told that God is no respecter of persons. If they were not, they ought, for the Bible says so.

Those who claim that they and theirs were saved by a special act of providence are ten-fold more self-righteous, arrogant, and selfish than the Pharisee who thanked God that he was not as other men. If God in his wrath proposed destroying certain persons and property in Jamestown on account of their wickedness, why was he not as just and merciful to them as he was to those of old whom he intended to destroy, viz., Nineveh, Sodom and Gomorrah, etc.? Why did he not tell them that they had the most wicked little city in the world, and that their abominations which they wrought under the sun were more than he proposed to stand, and unless they repented in sackcloth and ashes he would positivly cyclone them or giv them a dose of fire and brimstone? Had he thus warned them, I hav no doubt they would hav repented in sackcloth—or almost any other cheap cloth—and ashes—or almost any other kind of dirt that was convenient and dirty. I hav no idea that those who suffered such sad and irreparable losses had the least suspicion that they were so much more deserving of punishment for their sins than their more fortunate neighbors who suffered not at all, and yet if the intervention theory is true they must hav been.

There is another phase of this providential question worthy of examination. It is in regard to God's destroying his own property, the God-houses, built for his own special glory and worship. A Springfield, Ohio, paper, speaking of the Jamestown cyclone, says, "It seemed to hav traveled out of its way to destroy churches," and such actually seems to be the fact in almost if not in every case. In Fort Madison, Iowa, on the third day of July, 1876, a tornado destroyed $60,000 worth of church property and not more than $1,000 worth of other property all told. The churches that suffered the greatest loss were the Catholic and Baptist, both new and elegant. The Catholics hav never been able to restore their church to its former elegance. The Baptists restored theirs, except a bell. They hav not been able to replace the bell, which was broken by the fall. They mortgaged the church to raise money to repair the damage done by the storm, which mortgage has remained on it until this spring, when, by the long and persistent efforts of its present pastor, it was raised, to the joy of the members. But alas! how fleeting were their joys! God in his infinit wisdom and goodness saw fit to send another cyclone last Monday afternoon and knock it down again. We would suppose they would take the hint this time and let it stay down. We would be like the Dutchman who had subscribed largely to build a church and was afterwards solicited for money to put a lightning-rod on the church. He said, "No; I hav helped to build a house for de Lort; now if he chooses to dunder on it and knock it down he does it at his own expense."

In Mount Pleasant, Iowa, several years ago, a fine church edifice (Baptist), just finished at a cost of $50,000, was destroyed by a tornado. The Presbyterian church, also a fine one, was destroyed, and little damage done other property.

In this city last fall a cyclone "seemed to travel out of its way" to destroy a God-house. And so we might go on and fill a volume with such cases. There are more God-houses struck by lightning in proportion to their numbers than almost any other kind of property. It is getting to be actually dangerous for ministers of the gospel to conduct religious services. I saw accounts of several being killed by lightning within the last year while conducting religious services—one while in the act of pronouncing the benediction at the head of the grave.

These things are very discouraging. Doubtless many will remember the sad account given several years ago of a crew of some three hundred and sixty ministers of the gospel who went down with the vessel in which they were sailing. An Infidel, the only person saved, put his trust in a good life-preserver which he had taken the precaution to hav with him. He had no faith in prayer. I myself would sooner put my trust in a good life-preserver on such an occasion than in the prayers of all the world and the power of all the gods thrown in.

The same Christian citizen said in his letter that "some who professed to be Infidels admitted that they prayed to God when the cyclone struck them." Well, I must confess that was the most nonsensical thing I ever heard tell of an Infidel doing. I am not at all surprised at the people called Christians who hav not emerged from the ignorance and superstitions of their ancestors, the Jews and pagans, from whence they got most of their religions, doing such foolish things. All people whom we call heathen, and especially the ignorant and superstitious of all religions, under such circumstances pray to their supposed angry gods to stay their wrath. But for those who profess to be civilized and enlightened, especially in the last quarter of the present century, to do such foolish things is discouraging to those who hav outgrown all such superstitious nonsense. If those who pretend to be Christians understood and actually believed the fundamental doctrins of the Bible they profess to believe they would never be guilty of such folly. The Bible, which purports to be the word of God, says that he is an infinit God—infinit in all his attributes, infinit in his purposes and designs; unchangeable—the same yesterday, to-day, and forever; without variableness or shadow of turning; who will do all his pleasure; whatever he has proposed that will he perform. Who with one grain of the commonest kind of common sense and a modicum of reasoning would be foolish enough to pray to such a God? The idea of changing the mind of an unchanging God or of getting him to do something he had not proposed doing is simply ridiculous. If he was subject to change at the instance of prayer the most vivid imagination would fail to picture a being so fickle. If God had anything to do with the Jamestown cyclone his purposes in regard to it were unalterably fixed decillions of years before the little planet upon which Jamestown stands—or stood—was in existence.

It seems to me that the untimely death of President Garfield ought to satisfy the mind of any sane person in regard to the efficacy of prayer. When the whole civilized world prayed for his recovery, God would not or could not grant their request, notwithstanding he has said in his book that where two or more are agreed concerning a certain thing he will do that thing. My own opinion is that a crazy Christian's bullet and the probes of two or three quack doctors were too much for him. They were about as hard for him to contend with as were the iron chariots of the people of the valley whom he said he could not drive out because they had chariots of iron.

Anyone who pretends to be an Infidel and has no more sense than to buck against a cyclone with a prayer ought to be sent to some benevolent institution for imbecils and idiots or hav some one appointed to look after him. Infidels—so-called—who hav become such by long, careful, and impartial investigation of the laws of nature and a thoroughly philosophical mode of reasoning in regard to the cause or causes of things, never pray to any God for anything, from the fact they know their prayer will not be answered. If there was such a God as the Christians' God it would be very unjust in him to answer an Infidel's prayer when he never answers the prayers of his professed followers except when they happen to pray—though generally very ignorantly—for something in accordance with the laws of nature, like the old lady in Cincinnati when the flood was at its highest prayed that the waters might not rise six feet higher. And they didn't. Some thought it was because the old lady prayed.

All heathen and all ignorant and superstitious people are humbled by such things as cyclones, earthquakes, volcanoes, and floods. Having no idea of their true causes, they suppose that some angry God or demon is thus venting his wrath upon them for something they hav done that displeased him, and so they go at once to propitiate him by debasing themselvs in the dust of humiliation, or by sacrificing to him some object most dear to their hearts. The Christian gets down on his knees and beseeches in sepulchral tones his God, whom he presumes is somewhere in the skies, in hearing distance, just out of danger, waiting to be asked to stop the storm or other pestilence. All sorts of debasements and genuflexions were first learned from the lower animals. It is natural for the domestic animal to get down and crawl up to his angry master. The language of such acts is, "See how humble I am. You can't strike such a poor humble creature as I am."

Scientific Infidels never debase themselvs, never prostrate themselvs in the dust before any supposed celestial being. The dust of humiliation is never found on their knees. They stand up like men and claim the right to think and act for themselvs, answerable only for their acts to their fellow-man at the bar of justice; and to no person, or bar, for what they think or believe. They seek out through nature herself the causes of all her motions and changes, submit themselvs with dignity to the inevitable, strive to prevent all that is preventable that is detrimental to their well-being, and strive to ameliorate the condition of their fellow-men and make them happy now and here, and are satisfied that the future will take care of its own. Their motto is, One world at a time.

In conclusion, I will say to those of you who hav lost relativs, friends, or property, or any or all of these, my sympathies are with you, and did my circumstances admit I would show my sympathy in a more substantial way. Should you ever build another dwelling, don't be foolish enough to think you hav been purged from all the sins that bring cyclones, and that your present scourge and sufferings will be immunity against the same in the future. If you do, in the language of the West, you will "get left." The best immunity against cyclones is a good cyclone cellar, and the best prayer you can make is to make that kind of a cellar.

Fred Douglass said when he was a slave he used to pray God to set him free. But the best prayer, he said, he ever made he made with his legs when he ran away. Probably the best way to make a cyclone cellar is, when you dig your house cellar, at the same time dig a narrow cellar from some part of it out into the yard as far as desired; build the wall up with the main cellar wall; leave a door between it and the main cellar; arch over the cyclone cellar; let the top of the arch be at least one foot below the surface. At the end leave an opening large enough for an adult to escape. Over this hav a trap-door that fastens below. There should also be an aperture at or near the outer end to admit air. Fill up and sod over the cyclone cellar, hav a substantial door between the main and cyclone cellar, and when you see a cloud coming that givs ominous signs of danger get all your family into the cellar, close the doors, and sing, "Blow away, gentle breezes." You will be as safe as Jonah was in the fish's belly. Don't be afraid of being laughed at by your neighbors for being a coward. That kind of thing is played out in the West, and seeing Jamestown is in the cyclone's way, you had better take warning. The man who takes the best care of his family is most fit to hav one.

MELA.

THE OLD AND NEW.

BURTON, MICH., June 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Of the old and new I shall speak in a theologic sense. From a careful and thorough examination of the subject I am fully convinced that in the days of Jesus, the apostles, and church fathers, and down to A.D. 150, the godhead of Jesus was not believed in, as taught by the Trinitarians of to-day. The nightmare had not seized the brains of wandering, hunted, and frightened Christians as they were dispersed by various persecutions over the different countries bordering on the Mediterranean Sea and its tributaries. The personality of the Holy Ghost was not taught and accepted by the then Roman Catholic church until A.D. 450. Jesus was believed in as a divine person, as the son of man, as the messiah, but that the father through him did the works. He was believed in as the manifestation of the divine power in performing what were called miracles, as healing the sick, casting out demons, raising the dead, as was supposed, the power or agency being the same as that controling good and gifted mediums to-day. The field is large, and I cannot amplify or present proof in a short article confirmatory of every important statement. In A.D. 325 a church council was called by the Roman emperor Constantine the Great, being the first Christian emperor, to convene at Nice, in Asia Minor, to settle the exciting controversy long and bitterly maintained between Arius and Alexander, both bishops of Alexandria, in Egypt. In this first Nicene council Arius was condemned and banished with some bishops of his party by the Trinitarians. Arius and his party taught the unity of God. The Trinitarians taught there were three Gods in unity, equal in power and glory. Under the lead of Constantine this latter dogma assumed organic form, and has held a prominent place in the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches to the present time. Down to the council of Laodicea in A.D. 363 the Old Testament, or Hebrew books, were considered the only sacred and inspired books by both Jews and Christians. At this council Origen's list of sacred books or parchments was accepted—viz., all the books of the Old Testament, with Apocrypha, as in the Douay or Catholic Bible. Those of the New Testament—four gospels, thirteen epistles of Paul, and all the others nearly as we now hav them, except the epistle to the Hebrews and Revelation or John. After many controversies these became parts and helped complete what was called the Sacred Canon, A.D. 397, which was pronounced by church leaders the infallible word of God, and assumed mastery over the human conscience in lands where the Christian Bible was accepted. Since then, under church rule, men hav not dared to reason on theological questions, only to simply learn what the book said through the priests, then, like abject, cringing slaves, served God in fear. Few in those dark ages could either read or write. The Bible was in the hands only of popes, bishops, priests, and monks. These only were its interpreters, and their schemes of dominion and aggrandizement gave awful color to its teaching. When the book assumed mastery, progress in ethics and religious knowledge ceased, and man became its cringing slave, and only as he has dared to throw off this galling yoke, this priestly bondage, and return to the plain morality and religion of Jesus, Confucius, Christna, Hillel, and many of the grand religious souls gone before—the plain, simple, and exalting worship of a loving father; the communion, comfort, and help of angels, once human—has his religion been rational, peaceful, hopeful, and elevating. The Christianity of to-day is a monstrosity; Jesus knew nothing of it. The pomp, parade, pride, and show of popular churches would again thrust the spear and press the thorny crown upon the head of the master, should he appear in their courts and teach and heal the sick as in the long ago. Along the bloody centuries, the dogmas of the fall, eternal punishment in a lake of literal fire and brimstone, pardon of sins, three Gods in one, eternal life and bliss in heaven, hav been held as essentials of a religious faith—in every possible way, through pope, priest, monk, and cardinal, they hav been fastened upon the souls of men, women, and children.

Men hav not dared to reason upon theology, only in subjection to the infallible book. Men will reason fairly on all questions except on religious subjects. Here their reason is palsied from long disuse. The idea that the Bible is inspired, and is the only rule of faith and practice, hangs like a nightmare upon the souls of men. To break this spell, to induce men to read all scriptures as the works of men of barbarous ages, as they would any other human production, is the main hope of the world. The dark ages of a thousand years was when the church had her way. When Luther broke with her it was not on the question of church dogmas, but on her assumption of divine power over the souls and bodies of men. In fact, he brought with him and fastened upon his adherents all the church myths of 1,500 years, including transubstantiation. Lutherans now hold that in the sacrament the bread and wine become by priestly manipulation the literal body and blood of their master. All Roman Catholics hold the same view. The church has tried to subsist upon this fiction of body and blood until her spirituality has become paralytic.

Did Jesus teach the fall of man? If so, where? What he did not teach is no part of Christianity proper. Modern Christianity rests entirely upon the teachings of Paul. The entire scheme of salvation is based upon the fall. In the coming "age of reason" that dogma must fall, and the entire bloody scheme built upon it. Then the hopes of men will rest upon the scientific basis of natural morality, where virtue brings happiness, and vice misery, here and hereafter, and men can calculate results as they would eclipses, without calling in the scapegoat. The sooner we leave the air-castles and anchor on this stratum, the more promptly will reason and common sense come to our rescue. The so-called old lights are growing dim and fading from human sight. They must giv place to the new. They hav been weighed in the balance and found wanting. The new is on hand and at the door. Telegrams hav been received from "across the blue sea," from the immortal homes of many of the best of our race. Thousands hav shown themselvs in materialized forms to the joy and perfect satisfaction of their earthly friends under the strictest test conditions. Some mediums are deceivers, and hav sought to make merchandise out of the hopes of men. But the greater part are true, honest, and self-sacrificing. Did they not positivly know they were chosen messengers of loving friends, to giv to the world important facts, they would not act in that capacity subject to obloquy, slander, and misrepresentation. But millions know immortality is a scientific fact. It can no longer be gainsaid. Demonstration has settled it as a sublime and glorious truth. What matters it if the church, true to her evil habit of crushing out every idea that militates against her methods, cries devil, humbug, mind reading, psychology, etc.? What matters it if Brothers Winter, Sunderland, and many others object? They hav not reached or fail to appreciate the proofs, though as demonstrable as chemistry, clairvoyance, or magnetism. Some are color blind. Some are spirit blind, or, in other words, do not perceive spiritual facts, ideas, and laws. They are not to blame. It is constitutional. They lack the organs or faculties. The germ is there. When the shuck is cast off open vision will develop it "over there." The errors of fifteen centuries cannot be removed in a day. The battle will be long and heavy. Organic and hoary myths, intrenched in college, church, and school will hav to be met in open field, and vanquished under the guns of truth and reason. Giv the iconoclast room. Let the images be broken. The builders will come in season and construct anew on a scientific basis. In autumn the "sere and yellow leaf" of forest and field givs no evidence of rejuvenation. But when the new life from sun and rain forces root and bud, all nature dons her finest robes, the throbbing, teeming, and radiant world is made more balmy and glorious by past decays. So the old faiths must giv place to the new, and the theological debris of the past ages givs sap and nutrition to the religion of science for the healing of the nations. But what do telegrams from the land of the immortal reveal to us? He that hath ears to hear let him hear:

"There is no death. What seems so is transition.
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life Elysian,
Whose portal we call death."

There is no pardon for sin. Its consequences affect or injure man only, and will be outgrown. There is no angry and avenging God, only one of law and love. There is no endless torture to any one human soul. Sorrow and suffering are disciplinary, work repentance, and result in moral progress and consequent elevation to higher grades, and others are constantly taking their places for the same object; and all are moving onward and upward under the law of progress. Man never fell as taught by the church, and consequently was never lost, only needing culture and moral elevation. There is no resurrection of the physical body, only of the spiritual. Man is not saved through the blood, merits, and intercession of the master. Every man is his own savior, and must depend upon himself. The world of mind and matter is ruled by unchanging laws, and happiness is found in studying and obeying them. Suffering adheres to the transgressor only. It cannot be transfered. All truth is based upon science, and science is a classified form of knowledge. There is no sin where there is no injury either against God or man. There is no sin against God as the soul of matter or the universe, because there is no injury, and hence no pardon to be granted, and the laws of nature become their own executors, and for the wrong-doer there is no escape only in ceasing to do evil. Pardon is a license to crime. Penalty is a remedy to deter from evil. Exact justice can in no wise clear the guilty. This power sweeps away all vicarious offerings for sin. The sinner may and should repent, reform, and outgrow sin's consequences. "Happiness is our being's end and aim," and our capacity for it is simply illimitable. If we will learn to comply with its conditions it is ours forever. No moral obliquities can invalidate this inheritance of endless happiness, only postpone. The lesson of all the ages past, compressed and voiced in thunder tones, is, Obey nature's laws and be blessed; disobey and suffer. Pain, sorrow, and suffering are needful agents in the economy of nature. They develop the moral and spiritual powers, and are the most efficient educators. They contribute largely to the supremacy of the moral sentiments, without which man would be a remorseless savage, unloving and unloved.

These are some of the revealments through media in the face of old superstition, to encourage, elevate, and bless the wretched, hungry, starving poor of every race and clime. Encouragement in the line of progressiv development is the world's greatest need. How cheerless the outlook if death ends all! Let us eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die, and all love, hope, culture, reason, and consciousness go out in darkness and silence; and o'er our disintegrating forms the storms of ages break. Human life, with its pains, trials, and sufferings, only a riddle and a curse. No future chance to correct errors, gain new ideas, triumph over failures; no, nought but a long oblivious sleep. The temple demolished, and the oracle dumb. Believe this who will. It is their right. But better views will illumine and cheer the heart in the good time coming. One of the mightiest agencies to speedily endow the soul of man, and send it forward with railroad speed on the solid and graded track of moral and intellectual progress, is right parentage and good ante-natal influences. No act involves so much as right procreation. Love, purity, health, and content, with pleasant surroundings, should overshadow every prospectiv mother. Parentage should be held as the greatest of all human sacraments. Then will spring to life children of love, health, and happiness, and with prophetic eye we may

"See a grand race our spacious courts adorn;
See future sons and daughters yet unborn."
Forms outwrought in beauty's classic mold,
In wealth of love and nativ charms untold,
With loud acclaim will ever bless the day
We sent them down this shining, guiding ray,
That through all future time will light their way.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: As an Infidel, I am truly glad to know that so many of your readers are alive to the most dominant political question of the times. Need I say I refer to the prohibition of the liquor crime? This movement is an Infidel movement, and has reached its present position through the Infidel's mode of advancement—scientific investigation. Science has shown that alcohol is a poison, and hence total abstinence from intoxicants is a duty. If this is true—and I challenge its denial—then prohibition of the sale, except for useful purposes, should be the law. The one is the logical sequence of the other. I am aware that theoretical objections to prohibition hav been eloquently and subtly put by our Brother Walker and others. But there are certain practical questions connected with this issue to which experience can giv indisputable answers, and which out-weigh, in the minds of ordinary people, the sophistries of theoretical objectors. With the opponents of prohibition, liberty is a favorit word. But the liberty for which they contend is the liberty of the highwayman when he puts his pistol to his victim's head, and says, "Your money or your life." It is the liberty of the rum robber when he, by the magic influence of music, and with the fair faces and sweet voices of women, induces the young and inexperienced into his saloon, and puts the poison to his lips and says, "Your money and your life." The personal freedom contended for by the opponents of prohibition has been the boast of all tyrants who hav robbed and enslaved mankind. It is only another name for licentiousness, and is the foe to true liberty. What is liberty? This may seem a strange question to ask the intelligent readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but it seems to me that some of your correspondents are ignorant of its true meaning. Their writings are merely an echo of the demands of the poison venders, who claim the right to debauch and destroy our people with their villainous stuff, as an inalienable right. Liberty has been invoked by the perpetrators of all crimes, and all forms of licentiousness and vice hav sought to hide behind the mask of personal rights and individual freedom. But what is liberty? Consulting the dictionary of our own language, we find that "civil liberty is an exemption from the arbitrary will of others, which exemption is secured by established laws, which restrain every man from injuring or controling another. Hence the restraints of law are essential to civil liberty." Referring to the lexicons of Greece and Rome, to whose splendid achievement we Infidels point to disprove some of the claims of the church, we find that there can be no such thing as liberty without prohibition. Ask the grand old heathen Cicero what was the meaning of the liberty which warmed the hearts of his countrymen and gave to the world the glories of Rome? And he replies (in his "Officus"): "One thing, therefore, ought to be aimed at by all men—that the interest of each individual, and of all collectivly, should be the same, for if each should grasp at his individual interest, all human society will be dissolved. And also, if nature enjoins this, that a man should desire to consult the interests of a man, whoever he is, for the very reason that he is a man, it necessarily follows that, as the nature, so the interests of all mankind is a common one. If that be so, we are all included under one and the same law of nature, and if this, too, be true, we are certainly prohibited by the law of nature from injuring another. But the first is true, therefore the last is true." I say this is a complete refutation to the sophism of the personal liberty defenders. Ask Frecthinking Germany what she understands to be the liberty which has so brilliantly illuminated her historic heavens, and through her distinguished Infidel philosopher and statesman, Baron Wilhelm von Humboldt, she replies: "The right of nature, when applied to social life, condemns all actions in which one man encroaches on the due province of another, and hence includes all those cases in which the injury arises from a blamable oversight, or when it is always associated with the action, or with such a degree of probability in the consequence that the agent either perceives it, or becomes accountable by overlooking it. But that the state should rest here seems justly questionable, especially when we consider the importance of the injury to be apprehended, and the possibility of rendering the restriction imposed on freedom only moderately hurtful to the citizen. In such a case it is clear that the right is undeniable on the part of the state." This is a complete answer to our honest opponents, and "pulverizes" the vaporings of the poison vendors of our country. Ask the Infidel author of the Declaration of Independence what was his conception of liberty, and then turn to his inaugural address of 1801: "With all these blessings, what more is necessary to make us a happy and prosperous people? Still one thing more, fellow-citizens, a wise and frugal government which shall restrain men from injuring one another, shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned. This is the sum of good government." I envy no man's receptiv capacity who can't see that Thomas Jefferson believed in the principle of prohibition. Let us take a look at another Infidel document—the charter of our liberties, the hope of the world, the Constitution of the United States: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect iunion, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselvs and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of Amcrica." I say that the liquor traffic does the very opposit of the things for which our government was organized to accomplish. It is not justice to license 200,000 unscrupulous men to pander to depraved appetites, and kill yearly 100,000 of our people. It is not justice to protect these traders in tears in a business which, according to eminent physiologists, in bringing into existence every year thousands of American children with alcoholic constitutions which predispose them to disease, pauperism, and crime. It is not establishing justice, nor promoting any of the objects for which our Constitution was adopted, to encourage a business the very nature of which is to attract into it principally depraved men, men in whose ears the clink of coin sounds louder than the wail of the widow and orphan, men who can stand the piteous appeals of broken hearts and ruined homes but who fear law, and by bribery and corruption control political parties, and seek to rule our courts as well as our jails and penitentiaries. Our Constitution does not sanction the personal liberty contended for by some of your correspondents, and by the whisky criminals throughout our country Chief Justice Taney says, "If any state deems the retail internal traffic in ardent spirits injurious to its citizens and calculated to produce idleness, debauchery, or crime, I see nothing in the Constitution of the United States to prevent it from regulating and restricting the traffic, or from prohibiting it altogether if it thinks proper (5 Howard, 676). I hav said that prohibition is the most dominant question of the day, and if my letter were not already too long, I would prove that it involves more dollars and cents, effects morals, industry, education, and political economy, more than any or all questions combined which now engage the attention of the American people. When it comes to pass that the great political parties of our country will not take cognizance of a question involving such vital interests, because of the arrogant dictations of this traffic, is it not an evidence that these parties hav outlived their usefulness, and is it not the duty of patriots to cast their ballots with higher aims than the serving of a whisky conspiracy?

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, if you desire to perpetuate this Infidel government, join hands with the brave, true man and woman of the prohibition party, "who with one hand on the heart and the other on the altar of their country" hav vowed to "pulverize the rum power." GEORGE T. BRUCE.

LA CROSSE, WIS., July 4, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I see Elmina has been reviewing Mr. Putnam's book on the "Problem of the Universe." I hav not seen the book. I hav only seen Elmina's quotations from it.

Now, Mr. Editor, with your permission I will review the few sentences which she has quoted. He says, "Mind is not property," and then claims, "It is a process, and is limited." What an idea—to be talking and writing about nonentities which are but words—words without substance or signification. You aver, "The soul of man is action, far-reaching, and penetrating." Now, if the soul is action, far-reaching, and penetrating, it must be something; then what is it?—for a hundred nonentities will not make a body. You claim, "Science sweeps the eternal heavens." Hav you been there with your sky scienc and seen it sweep? What an absurd expression! You aver "Law is not a thing," but add it is "a mode." Now, what a mode? Let us see what Worcester says about it. He says, "Mode is quality, manner of existence." Now, manner and quality of existence are not existence itself. Here is a lot o gab again about nothing. As for law, it presupposes a law maker, or giver. Who is the giver or maker—you, Mr. Putnam? You assert, "The universe is matter, and it is force." Now, if matter exists throughout all space, as you say, wher is your space for force, for you add they both exist." You claim it is not an "iron but a flowing universe." How ridiculous! You add, "If we fly in the face of nature she is ou enemy," and then assert there is "orderly force." What orderly force and "nature our enemy!" You claim, "Force flashed into the steamship, the palace car," and so on. I would think it flashed in the water that is in the boiler, if at al Now, I unhesitatingly deny that force is anything of itself, or any other of your attributes. But if you think differently, giv me their length, breadth, density, and thickness. I class al such words with power, space, attraction, repulsion, and so on, which to my view hav no existence in themselvs. But you do not mean that. You confound attributes of existence with existence itself, which I think is absurd. If your words hav any meaning, they must signify something that exists. From what Elmina says about your book, I think she does not understand it. To my view, what I hav seen of it, it is most all attributes. You remind me of what a German once said—"Some mens know some dings, but more almost noddings." And further adds, "Some professors mit pig heads hav too much talk, and not enough think," which I think is the case with you. I am your well-wisher, J. PETTEY.

WENTWORTH, D. T., July 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find draft for $6.85; please send books as per inclosed list. The last books sent I hav read and passed to Liberal friends, who hav read and passed to the next, and I think they hav added their mite towards rooting out old superstition. About two weeks ago a Methodist clergyman was called from a neighboring town to preach a funeral service. During his remarks he said he understood this was a nest of Infidels down here, and furthermore went on to say that any man that did not believe the Bible was not half a man, but more a fool. He chose a very appropriate place for these remarks, for out of respect to the mourners he was allowed to go his way. But he ruined church prospects in this vicinity, as nearly all of our business men are Liberal in belief, and all were hit the same way. I read the old TRUTH SEEKER, and then pass it around. W. L. HORTON.

OAK POINT, WASH. TER., June 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I see that by the 10th of this month my time for THE TRUTH SEEKER is up. So inclosed find $3 for another year. I am getting signers for the petition, and I will forward the same in a few days. But instead of petitioning, I think that the Liberals should demand; and if every Liberal would cast his vote independent of party politics, it would soon make a change in our office-holders and law-makers.

Yours for independence in politics and religion,
L. C. SCHARNHARST.

MILTON, OR., June 30, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed we send you some names for the petition. When we go around with such a paper we hav an opportunity to find out who the Liberals are. There are all sorts of excuses given. Some who profess to be Liberals refuse their signature for fear it will hurt their business. I tell such that I would sign it if I knew it would make a pauper of me. A man who is afraid to do what he knows to be right is no man at all. Respectfully, T. V. NICHOLS.

Baby Belle.

O trustful, soft, brown eyes that seek my own!
O pure, white palms, I clasped so close in mine!
How could I labor, severed from thy side?
How could I rest, denied thy kiss divine?

"My daughter!" In these words some sweet spell lies,
Which wins me from Fame's weary field of strife.
Weaving anew my web of shattered hopes
Lying long dormant 'neath a loveless life!

Thou art mine all, sweet child. There is no dream
In all my future where thou, too, art not!
No scene were fair without thee; for, alone,
Alike were palace proud, or peasant's cot!

Kiss me again, my darling! thy sweet breath
Fanning my cheek like some celestial breeze!
Sleep, little maiden, all the wealth of earth
Against thee weighed were dross—all gold beneath the seas!

KISS ME GOOD-NIGHT.

(Cradle-Song for Baby Belle.)

Kiss me good-night! The perfumed breeze
Steals through the casement; and, afar,
The wavelets beat the silv'ry sand
That shimmers 'pon the harbor-bar!

Kiss me good-night! Ah, little one,
Thou knowest nought of earth's dark strife;
No sorrow yet its shade hath cast
Athwart thy young and sinless life.

Kiss me good-night! Thy rosy palms
I press in mine. I stroke thy hair.
Ah, can it be the fates shall frown
'Pon such as thee, divinely fair?

Kiss me good-night! Ere in thy bed
I lay thee down to take thy rest,
Where visions bright shall haunt thy dreams
Amid the "Islauds of the Blest!"

Kiss me good-night! The lashes droop,
Deep-fringed, upon thy velvet cheek;
Thy sunny curls sink on my breast,
And nature's sweet repose bespeak!

Then slumber on; no harm shall come
To thee, for I am by thy side,
Till, joyous, on the jocund morn,
Thy lustrous eyes are opened wide!

A Funny Fellow.

HOW HE WAS CURED OF PRACTICAL JOKING.

"Now, Benny, will you try to be a good boy, and not cut up any more capers? You do act so; I don't know what to do with you. What does make you behave so, Benny?"

"I don't know, mother. I suppose I was born to behave just so, or else I wouldn't," and Benny adroitly threw a loop that he had been making on the end of a line, right over Neb's head, and drew him, yelping along the floor.

Neb was the name of the dog. His whole name was Nebuchadnezzar, but they called him Neb for short.

"You hurt the dog, Benny. Oh, why don't you act better?" and Mrs. Handy looked grieved and sorrowful.

"Well, I will act better, mother, see if I don't," said Benny, kissing his mother fondly as she tied her bonnet strings preparatory to going out.

In the course of an hour, when she returned, what did she see but all her pretty hens, Daisy, Dolly, Matilda, Angelina, and all the others who had no names but common Biddy, half shorn of their beautiful plumage, and fluttering about in a dazed and bewildered manner.

"Why, what is the matter with the hens?" she inquired in some alarm.

Nannie, Ben's little sister, spoke quickly, "O mamma, Benny blew up the hens, and the old rooster, too!"

"Blew them up? How did he blow them up? Tell me, Nannie."

"He put a lot of corn on the flat rock, and called them all there to hav a lunch; then, while they were eating, he made a ring of gunpowder all around them, and put a fuse on it, and then he lit the fuse! And the hens went up in the air, and the feathers flew in all directions! And, mamma, they cackled and squalled, awfully!"

Of course Benny had a good scolding, and you would think he would not hav meddled with the fowls again. But not long afterward, his father sent him to throw out a lot of wild cherries that had been soaked in alcohol, and what did he do but carry them out in a vacant lot, and call the neighbor's turkeys, who gobbled them up in short order.

"Oh, dear, dear!" said old Mrs. Temple, "my lovely turkeys are all dead," and she rushed into her house in great agitation. There they lay scattered about the yard as dead as herrings! "They must hav been poisoned, and it's too bad, too bad!" And sure enough, there lay a dozen or more, fat, handsome turkeys, apparently lifeless and inanimate, upon the ground.

"I suppose I might save the feathers," said the bereaved woman, and she proceeded, without more delay, to pluck the turkeys of their fine dresses. When she had finished her work, she sat down and cried heartily. An hour later she went to bury their dead bodies, when, to her astonishment, one by one, the turkeys came staggering, and reeling toward her, looking sheepish and ashamed.

"Gobble, gobble, gobble," said the old gobbler. "Where are our coats and neckties?"

"What was the matter with the creatures, I wonder? How comical they do look, anyway!" and Mrs. Temple surveyed them with curious eyes.

"Gobble, gobble, gobble, gobble!" shrieked the old father, shivering like a leaf.

"That means that they've been drunk!" said Ben, looking over the stone wall. "Big fools! they hav been stuffing themselvs with the cherries that I threw out. Idiots! not to know any better than that! I knew men would be such fools, but I did think turkeys might know better," and Ben winked at the creatures.

One Sunday afternoon, Benny's mother had invited the minister and a few friends to tea. She got everything ready before she went to church, set the table, and left Benny to keep house till she returned with the company.

When she came, accompained by the minister and two or three friends, Benny met them at the door with a smiling countenance. There was a roguish twinkle in his eye, however, and his mother was almost afraid he had been in mischief, but everything appeared as when she had left, and her misgivings were put to flight.

They were all seated around the table, and the minister very solemnly invoked a short blessing. Then the covers were removed from the dishes and, instead of the oyster stew, roast beef, etc., in every dish appeared only beans—raw, uncooked beans.

"Benny," said the mortified woman, "I am ashamed of you! What do you mean by such conduct?"

"I only meant to hav a little *bene*diction!" said Benny, with a grave face.

His father frowned, and bade him bring on the edibles, which he had hidden ere he substituted the beans upon the table, at which good humor was restored, and the long faces were changed into smiling ones.

After this, Benny was sent to his grandfather's, hoping that he would turn over a new leaf and cease playing practical jokes.

His grandfather lived in an old-fashioned house, in which was a huge kitchen and an ample fire-place. In this kitchen, religious meetings were wont to be held once every two weeks. Indulging his love of fun, Benny had incurred the displeasure of Deacon Plunkett, who had sharply reproved him for his irreverence during meeting-time, and commanded him to sit beside him at the next meeting, and see if he could be kept in a prayerful frame of mind.

When meeting night came, Benny seated himself demurely beside Deacon Plunkett on the long bench attached to the old-fahioned loom, that in the winter-time was suffered to remain in the kitchen. Overhead, depending from the beams, were bunches of herbs, catnip, life-everlasting, double tansy, wormwood, and thoroughwort; strings of red-peppers, some long skeins of blue yarn that had just been dyed, and, among a lot of other articles, a small but very full bag of mustard seed.

A string of red peppers fell down, and Benny stood up to replace them, when he espied the bag of mustard seed. With his knife he made an incision, and out dropped a mustard seed, one, two, three, and more, right on top of Deacon Plunkett's bald head, and from thence rolled down to his neck, and disappeared inside his collar.

The deacon scratched the bare place on his head, and rubbed his shoulders against the loom.

Benny never smiled, but watched the mustard seed descend, while the deacon prayed for greater faith and more knowledge.

Presently Benny slyly pulled the stick from its place in the loom, where it held the bench upon which he was seated in place, and, suddenly, with a jerk, down went one end of the plank, and up went the other upon which Deacon Plunkett sat, and away went his head through one of the long skeins of yarn! Benny rolled head over heels on the floor, laughing to himself at the figure Deacon Plunkett made, as well as at the troubled and astonished faces of the audience present.

The next morning Benny was sent home in disgrace, and found his oldest sister was soon to be married.

"Now Benny," said she, "I dare not let you be present at the ceremony for fear you will do something dreadful, and make us all ashamed. So you will hav to remain in another room until it is over."

"Oh, please let me see you married; please do," he pleaded. "I will be good, indeed I will, Maria, if you will only let me come in. I never saw a wedding in all my life."

"Well, if you promis to behave, you may come in, but be sure you sit still and say nothing."

"Yes, Maria," said Benny very demurely.

When the hour for the interesting ceremony arrived, the guests were all in their places, but Benny was absent. After a search he was found and bade to come in.

"I will be there in a minute," he answered. "May the cat come, too?"

"Yes, Benny," said his mother. "Come right along."

Presently in he came, and just as the ceremony was about half over, in came Rebecca, the cat, making a great racket, and causing a titter to run through the assembly. Benny had split some large walnuts through the center, and stuck them on Rebecca's four feet with shoemaker's wax. You can imagin what a piece of work she made of walking, and how ridiculous she appeared as she went up in front of the bride and uttered a prolonged me-ow!

Soon after this occurrence Benny went away to school, and the strange boys there commenced a system of hazing, as they sometimes do with fresh boys in college. One night they secured a rope about Benny's person, and dragged him quite a distance, unheeding his cries and pleadings to be let alone.

"Poor Nebuchadnezzar! and poor Deacon Plunkett!" said Benny. "This reminds me of how I used to torture them. I wonder if they can ever forgiv me!"

When the Fourth of July came, some boys invited Benny, who was home enjoying a vacation, to celebrate with them Independence Day. They had a lot of fireworks, firecrackers, Roman candles, "nigger-chasers," skyrockets, pistols, torpedoes, and a tar-barrel. Benny was among the foremost to handle the fireworks, and set them off.

By and by, amid the reports of rockets and snapping of crackers, there came a bang, a fizz, lots of smoke, and a dreadful smell of powder and singed eyebrows.

Poor Benny was a sight to behold, with a blackened and burnt face, hair, eyebrows, and hands dreadfully singed, and his clothing disarranged. Oh, how his face smarted! how his eyes ached! and his hands! oh, how badly they were scorched!

"If mother's hens and the old rooster felt like this when I blew them up, I pity them, that's all!" and he groaned in agony.

After awhile, like all other boys, Benny grew to be a young man, and one time he went on what was termed a "racket" with three other young men. While enjoying the "racket," Ben drank several glasses of whisky, beginning first with root beer. The effects of the whisky overcame him so much that he fell down. His companions dragged him to a secluded spot and left him. Two rough men came that way and robbed him, not only of his money and gold watch, but most of his clothing, so that when he came to his senses he shivered with cold.

"Where's my coat and my necktie?" he asked dubiously of the wind. "And where's my gold studs, and sleeve-buttons, and my vest? And what's the matter with me, anyway?" gazing around, bewildered.

"I guess you've been drinking," said an old man on his way to market in the early gray of the morning. A woman was in the wagon with the man, and she said loud enough for Ben to hear, "Maybe he knows how my turkeys felt when they made a meal of wild cherries one time!"

It was Mrs. Temple. Ben sneaked along like a culprit, walking worse than Rebecca did when her feet were stuck up with shoemaker's wax, and she was waddling along on walnut-shell shoes.

He had often promised he would do better, and would turn over a new leaf. This time he actually did turn a leaf. He saw how his love of fun had made others unhappy, and honestly declared that what he would not wish done to himself he would never do.

He saw, also, that "rackets," if followed up, would destroy him, soul and body, and he resolved that his first "racket" should be his last.

He became a good, wise, and honest man, and although he had a great love of jokes, he was careful that they were always innocent, and that no creature, not even a fowl or cat, was harmed thereby. There was a great deal of merriment in his nature, but it was purified by experience, and although he was called a "funny fellow," he was liked far better than he would hav been had he persisted in his early methods of playing jokes.

Our Puzzle Box.

A MATHEMATICAL CURIOSITY.

Write all the digits except the figure 8 thus: 12345679.

Multipiy the above by 9, and the product will be all 1's. Double the multiplier, and the product will be all 2's. Add the first multiplier (9) to the last, and the result will be all 3's. And by adding the first multiplier (9) to the last for a new multiplier, the result will be all 4's. So on by adding the first multiplier (9) to the last one, it raises it one number higher each time, so that the result can be made any figure you like. H. VAN PELT.

REBUS.

Five letters do my magic name compose,
Which any one can curiously dispose.
My first one by itself, as I'm alive,
Will count two hundred times the entire five.
My second is no less a standing wonder,
It counts just nothing by itself, or under.
My third's a paradox, you my depend,
It's just the middle of a midge-tail's end.
My fourth is two third's of an ox's eye,
Sometimes you'll find it in a pumpkin pie.
My fifth you'll see on any cloudy day,
In yonder sky resplendently gay.
My whole's the talisman that rules mankind.
If you can't guess me now, you must be blind.

Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New estament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

The Moss Engraving Company.

But few persons are aware to what extent photography is used, directly or indirectly, in the various arts and trades. To even enumerate its various applications would make a very long list. The production of engraved plates for printing purposes by means of photography is at present exciting great interest, not only in this country, but all over Europe; and new processes are being introduced with such rapidity that it is difficult to keep trace of them.

Attempts were made in this line some twenty-five years before Daguerre's great discovery was announced to the world, and it has been held by some writers to be owing to the early experiments made by Nicephore Niepce (Daguerre's partner) in this direction that we owe he invention of photography. After the experiments of Niepce, the next to attempt this was Fox Talbot. Soon after this many others entered the field; among the most prominent of these we may name Dr. Donne, Prof. Grove, George Mathiot, Fizeau, Negre, Poitevin, and Paul Pretsch.

The first, however, to achieve a complete practical success in this line was one of our own countrymen, John C. Moss, who was born n 1838, in Washington county, Pa. In 1856 he married Miss Mary A. Bryant, the only daughter of a widow lady. In 1858 he was engaged in the photographic business in Monongahela City, Pa., and while reading an account of some experiments made by Prof. Grove, in which he tried to produce engraved plates by etching out the daguerrean image, but having failed to get his etchings deep enough to be of any practical value, it occurred o Mr. Moss that by using Prof. Grove's method he could etch through the thin coating of silver on the daguerrotype plate, and then change the plate to another solution which would act upon the copper and not act upon the silver, and by this means get the required depth.

He told his wife of his plan. "Why not try it at once?" said she, "and I will help you." "But I hav no galvanic battery, and there is none to be had in this place; besides, I cannot spare the money to buy one if there were." "Can't you make one yourself," said she. "If I only had some copper and zinc plates I hav all the chemicals," he replied; "but there is no such thing for sale nearer than Pittsburgh." His wife disappeared for a few moments, and then returned with their copper kettle and zinc washboard. "They would do," said he; "but, oh, my! how your mother will scold if we cut them up; they are almost new." "Leave that to me," said she; "mother is out, and we will get the battery made before she comes back." So they went to work with might and main, and by bringing the sugar-bowl and the teapot into requisition for battery cells, they soon had the battery completed; but before they had time to clear away the scraps their mother came in. She didn't scold just then; she couldn't; she only held up her hands and gazed in stupefied amazement.

That night they managed to get all their appliances in their sleeping room and then, in stocking feet, they experimented nearly all night. Before morning they had produced their first plate. It was all bad but one little patch, about as big as one's finger nail, and that, as Mrs. Moss expressed it, was "just beautiful, and almost as deep as a well." Alas! alas! great inventions are like Topsy in the story of Uncle Tom's Cabin, who said: "I never was born; I growed."

In their exultations that night they did not realize that nearly ten years of constant experimenting under the most trying circumstances, often in great poverty and want, would roll away before they would be able to make the first plate that would be paid for and used.

He soon gav up the photographic business and commenced the publication of a country newspaper. This was not successful; so he went to Philadelphia and worked as a journeyman printer through the day, and spent his evenings and Sundays in reading and experimenting, his wife assisting him in everything he did. Through the day she would purchase and mix the chemicals, and get everything in readiness for him. Many, many times success would seem so near that he would giv up his employment and they would devote all their time to experimenting, until not only their little savings were exhausted, but until they had sold everything that could be disposed of. On one occasion, having sold nearly everything but a feather bed, a gift from Mrs. Moss's mother which they had resolved never to part with, he said that if he had a few dollars more to buy chemicals, success would be sure. Overhearing the remark Mrs. Moss quietly left the room, and in a short time returned with hasty steps and presented to the astonished eye of Mr. Moss a $10 bill.

"Why, Mary! where did you get that?" exclaimed he. "The other day I heard the washerwoman say that she was saving up money to buy a feather bed; so I went and sold her mine;" then added, with a merry laugh, "feather beds are very unhealthy to sleep on, anyway. We will pick out a soft board, it will make us grow straight."

The $10 was soon spent, and still other difficulties to be surmounted; more chemicals were needed. Nothing remained but a small cooking-stove and an old-fashioned rocking-chair, a sort of heirloom of Mrs. Moss's family; and her mother had charged her never to part with it, for it would bring bad luck to the family. So the stove went first. Mrs. Moss said cheerfully, "It made the room too hot; besides, I will giv up tea, and I can make your coffee and cook what little we need upon our alcohol lamp." A few more chemicals were still needed. Mrs. Moss was again equal to the emergency—the old chair was sold; but this time, as she drew out the money, the tears came to her eyes, but when she saw the sadness of her husband's pale and haggard face, she said cheerfully, "Never mind; we will soon liv in our own home, and hav all the nice furniture we want." Success was still far in the future. Mr. Moss went back with a heavy heart to "sticking type," while Mrs. Moss kept on with their experiments.

Many such domestic dramas had to be passed through before success finally crowned their efforts. We shall only mention one more instance.

It was after they had commenced practically working their process in a small way in their own dwelling. They had what they considered a large order on their hands, and their chemicals were, as photographers would say, "kicking" badly. One part of their process failed them entirely; the chemicals would not work as they had worked before. Day after day passed, but still they could not succeed. The time was up for the delivery of the plates, and they were getting fairly desperate; they saw that one part of their process must be radically changed before they could ever succeed. They had scarcely slept for several nights. Mr. Moss had devised one method of overcoming the difficulty which seemed to him faultless in theory, but still it failed in practice. Mrs. Moss insisted that he had not given it a fair trial. About two o'clock in the morning Mr. Moss sat down upon the side of the bed, worn out and in utter despair. Tired nature soon gave way and forced sleep upon him.

When he awoke in the morning, he saw by the bright smile on his wife's weary face that she had overcome the difficulty. She had prepared for him a good breakfast—a hot loaf of Graham bread, with fresh butter, and a pot of steaming coffee. Mrs. Moss had remained up all night, and had repeated the experiment with complete success. No king's feast was ever eaten with so much relish as that little family enjoyed their plain and simple breakfast, for it seemed to them that the last difficulty had been overcome. The order was speedily finished, and the proceeds sufficed to supply their most urgent wants. But their troubles were far from being at an end. Their outfit, though sufficient for experimental purposes, was not suitable for practical work. However, they gained ground little by little, until they found it necessary to take a place of business in New York city. They fitted up a loft at No. 26 Cedar street, but still labored under great disadvantages for want of capital and skilled workmen. Here their work began to attract considerable attention, and Mr. Moss was induced to engage in a stock company with a view to working the process on a large scale.

In 1870 the Actinic Engraving Co., was formed; but as his associates had no experience in the business, and could giv him but little assistance, and were willing to invest but a small amount of money, he was worse off than he had been before the company was formed.

For nearly a year and a half he struggled against adversity, and was finally compelled to withdraw from the company in which he had lost all of his first outfit. He soon affer entered into an arrangement with Rev. Mr. Hobart, who agreed to loan $10,000 for a half interest in a new company to be formed. The Photo. Engraving Co. was incorporated in the spring of 1872, and opened an establishment at No. 21 Dey Street, but had barely commenced operations when they were completely burnt out. They immediately fitted up again at No. 62 Cortlandt street.

The first year proved very discouraging, as new apparatuses had to be constructed or purchased, and above all employees had to be patiently and carefully trained to perform their respectiv duties, it being an entirely new branch of industry for which no skilled labor could be procured; and to make matters worse Mr. Moss's health was rapidly giving way. Long hours of toil and great mental anxiety had reduced his weight from 170 to 110 pounds; besides, he had almost become incapable of sleep. He seldom slept over two hours out of the twenty-four, and then only for a few moments at a time, while his ever patient wife sat by his bed and applied wet cloths to his fevered brow. He looked like a man in the last stages of consumption. One Saturday night their bookkeeper announced a small gain for the last month. This favorable announcement brought about quite a crisis with Mr. Moss. He went home in a very happy state of mind, and that night he slept so soundly that his wife watched by his bedside throughout the night—he was so calm and motionless that she feared his end was near. After ten or twelve hours he awoke, greatly refreshed, and from that time he continued to gain in health and strength.

The second year the company began to prosper, and Mr. Hobart was soon paid back the $10,000 he had advanced to the concern. After that their prosperity continued for several years. But Mr. Hobart was getting old, and his health grew feeble. Under these circumstances he became loth to expend more money for new improvements, while on the other hand Mr. Moss, being in the prime of life, was eager to go on increasing the facilities to meet the growing demand for their work. Dissatisfaction gradually sprung up between them, so Mr. Moss named a sum which he would be willing to giv or take for the business. Mr. Hobart and his friends bought out the interest of the Moss family. Mr. Moss was then free, and with all the capital he needed, and with his long years of practical experience and many new improvements and inventions which he had never felt warranted in introducing previously, he immediately set about fitting up on a large scale.

In the spring of 1880 the Moss Engraving Co. was formed, with John C. Moss as president and superintendent; his wife, M. A. Moss, as treasurer; their son, Robert B. Moss, assistant superintendent; and Jas. E. Ramsey and Henry A. Jackson, old and trusted employees, as secretary and assistant secretary. This company was a great success from the start, and is now the largest establishment of the kind in the world. Their place of business is at 533, 535, 537, and 539 Pearl street.

Mr. Moss, though in his forty-seventh year, is in the best of health, and looks younger than he did when we first remember him some twelve or fifteen years ago.

Mrs. Moss was in rather feeble health for several years after the death of her beloved mother and an only daughter; but she rides out almost daily, has regained much of her wonted energy and cheerfulness, and seems to enjoy the fruits that, with her husband, she labored so faithfully to earn.—Anthony's Photographic Bulletin.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

Gems of Thought.

ALL gods and religions hav been based upon the great untruth of supernaturalism; all hav been composed largely of the same gross falsehoods, and all hav been inimical to the best interests of the human race. All hav fallen short in affording to man the truths he needed, all produced darkness instead of light; all proved an incubus instead of an aid; all augmented the evils of ignorance instead of increasing knowledge.—D. M. Bennett.

HOME.—A happy well-ordered home is a paradise. It is a place where love, joy, peace, and true happiness abound. It is a refuge where rest, quiet, and contentment abide. It is a store-house to which we carry all our treasures and place them therein in safety. It is where we work, eat, sleep, read, play, talk, and are ourselvs at our very best. It is where we liv, love, and are best beloved. Is it a wonder, then, that poets sing sweetest of home; that artists paint home as the most delightful of all spots; and that lovers picture the home they will create as the abode of all that fancy can invent, or imagination can conceive as choicest, best, and loveliest? Blessed be the sweet, magical word home, and may every heart feel its worth, and every hand help to make more and still more homes to bless and beautify our own joyful and happy earth.—Elmina D. Slenker.

THERE is one miracle peculiar to John (ii, 1-11) of so singular and apocryphal a character as to call for special notice. The turning of water into wine at the marriage feast in Cana of Galilee has long formed the opprobrium and perplexity of theologians, and must continue to do so as long as they persist in regarding it as an accurate historical relation. None of the numberless attempts to giv anything like a probable explanation of the narrativ has been attended with the least success. They are for the most part melancholy specimens of ingenuity misapplied, and plain honesty perverted by an originally false assumption. No portion of the gospel history, scarcely any portion of the Old Testament, or even of the Apocryphal narratives, has such unmistakable marks of fiction. It is a story which, if found in any other volume, would at once hav been dismissed as a clumsy and manifest invention. In the first place, it is a miracle wrought to supply more wine to men who had already drank much—a deed which has no suitability to the character of Jesus, and no analogy to any other of his miracles. Secondly, though it was, as we are told, the first of his miracles, his mother is represented as expecting him to work a miracle, and commence his public career with so unfit and improbable one. In the third place, Jesus is said to hav spoken harshly to his mother, asking her what she had in common, and telling her that his hour [for working miracles] was not yet come, when he knew that it was come. Fourthly, in spite of this rebuff, Mary is represented still expecting a miracle, and this particular one, and as making preparation for it. She said to the servants, "Whatever he saith to you, do it," and accordingly Jesus immediately began to giv orders to them. Fifthly, the superior quality of the wine, and the enormous quantity produced (135 gallons), are obviously fabulous. And those who are familiar with the apocryphal gospels hav no difficulty in recognizing the close consanguinity between the whole narrativ and the stories of miracles with which they abound.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

[NOTE.—The miracle of Cana was at any rate a good beginning, but to think of the same omnipotence being drawn upon to procure a penny to pay his taxes (Matt. xvii, 27). What a falling off was there, my countrymen! A truly fishy story.—Hylax.

GOD has not put us into a world where life and death depend upon the accuracy of another man's calculations, or the question as to whether he is minded to tell the truth. The great question as to what kind of a universe this is; as to what kind of a God manifests himself through its laws—this is not a matter of doubtful history, but of scientific verity. Then as to the nature of man, what kind of a being he is, according to what laws he needs to liv in order to develop himself, in order to organize into societies and states, to attain his highest possible welfare. This is not a question of doubtful historic testimony, it is a matter of scientific observation, experiment, and verification. Again, as to what evil is, as to the causes of crime, of pauperism, of all those ills that undermine human happiness, that shadow the world, and blot out the light of heaven—these are not matters that depend on testimony; they are questions for observation, for experiment, to be settled by the scientific method. And so of all great problems—those of religion, those of morality; the deepest questions of society and statesmanship, and all practical control and conduct of life are not those concerning which we need be in any doubt. They do not depend upon any gospel, or Bible, or book, or testimony of any witness who is now dead. They depend upon the great facts and laws all around us, in whose arms we are, in whose presence we stand, in whose power we liv and breathe. They depend upon those things that are open to the observation and experiment of the world.—M. J. Savage.

BEES! BEES! BEES!

FROM $2,000 TO $5,000 A YEAR KEEPING HONEY BEES.

The particulars are simply to prevent the great loss that most bee masters hav to contend with annually. Then giv the bees a chance to increase and collect surplus honey to their fullest capacity; all of which can be easily accomplished by using the kind of hive described in "Kidder's Secrets of Bee-keeping."

Send for the Book and see how easily it can be done with a few swarms of bees.

THIS BOOK IS A RELIABLE GUIDE

to all persons that keep bees, especially to the novice or new beginner, as it teaches how all of the troubles and disappointments that the bee master is liable to, can be successfully overcome, such as Foul Brood, Dysentery, Bee Robbery, Ravages of Moth Millers, Loss of Queen, loss of bees in Swarming time, by their flight to the forests, also the great loss in winter and early spring management, which is usually more than all other ways combined. This book will also inform the bee master HOW BEES WILL INCREASE AND THROW OFF SWARMS to an enormous extent, all conditions being favorable. The old stocks will frequently swarm three or four times each, and oft times the first swarms thrown off will swarm once or twice each, with a good hive and right kind of management. In warmer climates the bees will increase and swarm to a much greater extent.

GREAT YIELD OF SURPLUS HONEY.

This Book will inform the bee master how to get the greatest amount of surplus honey, and at the same time hav it in small packages weighing three-quarters of a pound to two or three pounds, as may be desired, which will command the highest price in market. In a good season the bee keeper may calculate on two or three hundred pounds of surplus honey from each old stock, and from fifty to one hundred pounds from the earlier young swarms, especially if they do not over-swarm.

NO MORE BEE-STINGS IN MANAGING BEES.

The Book will post the bee-keepers how to manage them when putting them on, or taking off surplus honey boxes, and not get stung in the whole operation.

BEE-KEEPING FOR OUR SONS AND DAUGHTERS.

It being the most pleasant, as well as the most profitable business that young people can engage in, and at the same time remain at home with their parents. The author has known of several young men who commenced the culture of the bee in their teens, and are now making more money than their fathers who run the farm, and doing it easily and with small investments. We must also remember that the women folks often make the best of bee-keepers, and not so liable to neglect them as the men folks.

KIDDER'S BEE BOOK

should be in the hands of all persons who like honey, and take an interest in the little honey bee. It contains more matter than many books that sell for two dollars, and is embellished with numerous cuts and drawings. There is no trouble, loss, or damage that a bee master has to contend with but what the book will giv the proper remedy by simply referring to the index, and that will point to the page where it is fully explained.

In order to bring this book more prominently before the mass of bee keepers, the Author proposes to giv, as a premium to each purchaser of a book, from this date until July next, the privilege of making his Celebrated Patent Bee Hive, as spoken of in book, for their own use (but not to sell) Free of Charge, otherwise there will be the usual Patent Fee of Five Dollars to each individual that wishes to make and use the hive

PRICE, BOARD BOUND, 75 cents; CLOTH, 85 cents.

N. B. The directions for hive making with cuts, drawings, etc., will be inclosed within each book sold, until July next, (not longer). Now is the time for all bee-keepers to avail themselves of this liberal offer, which is simply to buy a book at the Regular Price, before August next

"HOW did you like the doctor's sermon?" said one to his companion, as they were walking home from church. "First-rate. I always liked that sermon."

"CAN a man be a Christian and not be an activ politician in a republic?" is the subject of one of the Continent's prize essays. We don't know about the activ politician; but it seems difficult for a man to be a Christian without being an absconding bank president or cashier.—Puck.

LILLIAN: "What a queer title for a book!" Mary: "What title?" Lillian: "'Not Like Other Girls.'" Mary: "It is rather odd. Is it a novel?" Lillian: "Yes. I wonder what the heroin can be if she is not like other girls?" Mary: "If she is not like other girls I guess she must be a boy."

"TELEMACHUS, don't let me hear you laughing at a woman again because she can't sharpen a pencil. When you want something in that line to laugh at, do you just contemplate a man cutting out a paper pattern with a pair of scissors, by the united efforts of his right hand, lower jaw, and two-thirds of his tongue."

A FASHIONABLE Austin lady was very much shocked last Sunday at hearing the strains of an operatic air that were wafted from a neighoring beer saloon. "The police ought to stop that profane music on Sunday," she remarked indignantly. "Why, that's the same air we heard this morning in church," remarked her husband. "Yes, but that's a different thing." "What's the difference?" "We had our best clothes on then. That makes all the difference in the world."

MARK TWAIN tells this story of Mr. Bergh: A lady was talking with Mr. Bergh one day, and chanced to speak of a friend of hers who had lately been traveling out West. In crossing the frontier it became necessary that the father, mother, and three children should cross a somewhat swollen ford. Their only beast of burden was a mule. So the father placed two of the children on its back, then plunged in and led the beast in with him. It swam obediently behind him, and all reached the other shore in safety. At the man's bidding the intelligent mule returned to where the mother and child were waiting to cross. The mother, fearing to put too heavy a burden on the already tired animal, put only the child upon its back, bade him hold fast, and, with a prayer, led the animal to the water's edge. They plunged in, swam bravely for a time, then were seen to struggle and go down. "Oh, think, Mr. Bergh," said the excited and pitying lady, "just think what must hav been the feelings of that mother as she saw her darling child lost in the depths of that black water!" "True, oh, too true," sighed Mr. Bergh. "But did you ever think, my dear lady, what must hav been the feelings of the mule?"

THE HEATHEN IN HIS BLINDNESS.

"This," said the returned missionary to the Poor Heathen whom he had brought over, "is a church."

And the Poor Heathen greatly admired the church. By and by he asked:

"Who is the fat man with the big watch seal, who looks at the church as though he thought some of putting on a $50 bay window and raising the rent $500 a year?"

"That is a trustee," said the returned missionary.

"He does most of the praying, I suppose?" said, the Poor Heathen, who in his blindness knows very little about the way we do these things.

"No," said the returned missionary, "he don't believe in praying; he is a Bob Ingersoll man and believes that nobody deesn't know nothing and that they know that he knows that they know he knows they don't. He is not a member of the church, but he is a good, clear-headed business man, good manager, strong on real estate deals, and so he's a trustee. Doesn't take very much of a Christian to be a trustee, except in the country. In town a church only wants a good business man for trustee."

"And who is the man who stands in the door and glares at the people as they pass in, and tries to keep them out?" asked the Poor Heathen.

"That is the sexton," replied the missionary. "He doesn't believe in opening the church for religious services at all. He says the church was built to hav swell weddings in, and that for preaching and prayer meetings and other side shows of that nature the trustees should hire a hall."

"Who is the very young man who pushes people out of the way that he may hav room to pass in, and stoops very low as he enters the twenty foot door and sits directly under the steeple lest he should strike his head when he stands up?"

"That," said the returned missionary, "is the new superintendent of the Sunday-school. They are all that way at first. By and by, when he has forgotten every line of his beautiful speech, when there are distinguished strangers present, when he has started the wrong tune to an entirely strange hymn, and corrected himself by striking the right tune on a key so high that the chimes of Normandy couldn't ring second bass to it; when he has flunked, fair, square, and outright, on the first ten question in his question box, he will know less by a ton than he does now, and be a good, useful, earnest, and humble superintendent. He's only young and new, like an August persimmon."

"Here comes the owner of the church," the Poor Heathen said. "He looks as though he had decided to make pemmican of the sexton and trustee, and not hold any service to-day."

"No, that is not exactly the owner of the church," the returned missionary said; "that is the leader of the choir."

"Who is that meek, timid little man who is trying to creep in without letting the sexton see him, and who has just taken off his hat to the leader of the choir?"

"Oh, that is only the pastor of the church," the returned missionary replied. "Will you go inside?"

And the Poor Heathen said he would, because he rather guessed from their looks, the sexton and the leader of the choir had made up their minds to settle that morning which of the two should take the church and run it."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 11. No. 30. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, July 26, 1884. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

In Japan every newspaper employs a man whose sole occupation is to go to prison whenever a court orders that punishment for the editor; a new application, only, of the idea of vicarious punishment.

A Brooklyn clergyman declares that "the eternal glory of heaven would be incomplete without a background of infinit woe to set it in relief." That clergyman is hereby nominated for the background.

A graduate of the Michigan Theological University went to St. Paul, where, failing to get into a pulpit, he went to sawing wood. He now makes $2 a day and owes no man a cent. For a theological graduate, this man is a phenomenal success.

Mr. Tucker, in Liberty, thus outlines the political campaign: "One party nominates for president its strongest man, who is a rascal; the other nominates nearly its weakest, who is a nonentity; and between this knave and this nobody the workers of the country expect and are expected to choose the way of their salvation from the present economic chaos." That is the anarchistic view of it.

A crematory is to be built at Buffalo, N. Y., says an exchange, modeled after the famous one at Milan. No flame, but intense heat, will be used to reduce the bodies to ashes. The high temperature is afforded through pipes from a movable heater, which will be connected with the furnace. The required heat by this method must be 800 degrees, and it will take four hours to reduce a body to ashes.

William Smith, a blind man, peddled lead-pencils on Chatham street. He was arrested and sent to the almshouse for vagrancy. His wife, left alone, became melancholy, and one day last week she was found dead in her room with Paris green spattered over her face, and a glass half filled with beer and the poison stood on a table. Dangling from a nail on the otherwise bare wall, in a broken frame, was the motto, "God bless our home!"

Truth and justice are immutable and eternal principles—always sacred and always applicable. In no circumstances, however urgent; no crisis, however awful, can there be an aberration from the one or a dereliction of the other without sin. With respect to everything else be accommodating; but here be unyielding and invincible. Rather carry your integrity to the dungeon or the scaffold than receive in exchange for it liberty and life. Should you ever be called on to make your election between these extremes, do not hesitate. In every situation a dishonest man is detestable, and a liar still more so.

The editor of the Christian Advocate has followed the example of his clerical brethren and gone to Europe. He assures his readers that they need feel no alarm as to the conduct of the Advocate during his absence, as he has written a sufficient quantity of editorial matter to last until his return. It looks, indeed, as though the conduct of the paper should be the occasion of the least apprehension. It is the conduct of the absent editor which should be the subject of special prayer. As he states that he is about to crowd three years' vacation into one, it is feared that he intends to paint some of the oriental towns a brilliant occidental red.

Francis Galton, who has been investigating the heredity of genius, concludes that the brain of a child naturally tends to develop the faculties, more or less equally commingled, of both its parents. This general rule is, however, modified in the first place by the superiority of one sex over the other. In some families the influence of the father's intellect, or want of intellect, is conspicuous in all the children, and prevails altogether over that of the mother. In other families the positions are reversed, and in many instances some of the children resemble one parent and some the other. Sometimes they are like neither parent, but an uncle, aunt, or some other collateral relativ.

The Wesleyan Theological students are just like other college boys, only a little more so, the divinity that is supposed to hedge in shaveling theologians as well as kings being insufficient to prevent them from getting excited on lemonade and cigarets, and abusing everyone with whom they come in contact. Their disreputable performance on a recent journey from Middletown to East Haddam is reported by the Connecticut press as scandalous in the extreme. Their piety is kept for dress parade.

Elliott Preston wants this printed. The name of the paper from which it is taken he does not giv: "We regret deeply to learn that in the celebrated Johns Hopkins University at Baltimore there exists at present one of the largest and most activ physiological laboratories in the world, and from whence the cries of tortured animals are heard in the other departments of the building. It is stated that Professor Huxley, having visited Baltimore a few weeks ago, inspired the trustees of the University with the ambition to obtain distinction for their institution in this field of glory. The professor of physiology is Dr. Martin, of Cambridge; a pupil, we believe, of Professor Huxley."

A curious document, evidently drawn up by a lunatic, has just been recorded in Worcester, Mass. It is a deed of one-half acre of land in Ashburnham, Mass., with buildings. It states that "I, Charles Hastings, of Ashburnham, gentleman, in consideration of the love and good will of the Lord Jesus, and one cent found on the premises of his, the rightful owner of all lands, as recorded in the first book of laws, the Bible, fiftieth psalm of King David, 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th, and 23d, and 24th verses, the receipt whereof I do hereby giv, grant and convey unto the Lord Jesus, the supreme ruler of the universe, a portion of the late Colonel Joseph Jewitt's land," etc. It is hoped that the new owner of this real estate will not be backward about taking possession.

The "faithful" from this country, remarks a Protestant journal, who purpose visiting Italy, and enjoying the pleasure of kissing the pope's toe, will be saddened to learn that his holiness is so troubled with an ingrowing nail as to render the least pressure on the foot intensely painful. Fortunately, however, this affliction is confined to one foot, and the pope has substituted the left foot for the right in this important ceremony. The true Catholic will find no difficulty in believing that the left foot is the right one when the pope says so; and we see no reason why the exercise may not be just as charming and delightful, just as rational and philosophical, just as religious and profitable, with the great toe of the left foot as of the right one. It is a ceremony, however, that does seem a little out of harmony with the intelligence of the nineteenth century.

In attempted rebuke of Ingersoll's disposition to make sport of the Bible, Henry Ward Beecher recently said: "I would like to see the man who would bring down the cradle in which his children had been rocked and split it up for firewood and laugh to see it burn. What sort of a man would he be? When the child is gone and in some moment the mother finds in the drawer a little shoe that the child wore, she is bathed in tears, though the child has been dead for years and years; natural affection leads us to repeat the children's little broken language. The prattle becomes dear to us, and the little garments that would be absurd to put upon the grown man's back we hang up and look at as our children's heritage, as belonging to them." But this absurdity, Mr. Beecher, is just what the Christians are guilty of. Suppose the mother in question, instead of hanging up the garments of her child to cherish as mementoes, should don them and parade the streets therein. Would she not cut a most ludicrous figure? And if her sanity were not questioned, would she not be rightly ridiculed? Yet you, Mr. Beecher, and your fellow-Christians, don the outgrown garments of a barbarian theology and persist in walking the streets at noon-day; and then weep because Infidels, clad in more modern garb, are forced to hold their sides with laughter. Put away your Bibles, read them in your closets as the childish prattle of your ancestors, and no smile of ours shall disturb your tender recollections.—Liberty.

Mr. Spurgeon has been unbosoming himself to the Pall Mall Gazette. Some of his views, observes the London Freethinker, are worth noticing. For instance, he says that wealthy Nonconformists are only kept in the Liberal ranks by their hatred of the state church. This is what we hav always contended. At bottom, religious people take sides in all public disputes on religious grounds. Abolish the state church and it will then be seen that the Liberalism of nonconformity has been a historical accident. By and by all great issues will be cleared. We shall see on the one side Christianity and Conservatism, and on the other Freethought and Republicanism. Mr. Spurgeon also gave his view of the efficacy of prayer. He needs £8,000 a year, besides the endowment for his Orphanage; and, says he, "I ask God for it, and he sends it." It is difficult not to cry out "hypocrit," in reply to this statement. Mr. Spurgeon tells thousands of people, as well as the Lord, that he wants money; and when the cash arrives it always comes through human channels. Let Mr. Spurgeon tell the Lord only, and see if that personage will supply his wants. He knows better than to try.

The Ministerial Union of Trenton, N. J., met in that city May 26th, and adopted a resolution requesting the authorities to suppress the sale of newspapers on Sunday, and urging "all good citizens to discountenance and in every way seek to repress this and all other forms of Sabbath desecration." To this the Sunday Gazetteer remarks: "These meddlesome clergymen might just as well resolve that the sun shouldn't shine, as far as the result is concerned. They are religious mossbacks, fully a century behind the times. Sunday papers are published because the reading public demand them, and as it is the intelligent public that read, and intelligence shapes the government, there is no danger of a few clerical bigots suppressing the Sunday papers. The animus of these attacks upon 'Sabbath desecration' is apparent. The masses prefer the newspaper to the stale and effete sermons such preachers as those who congregated in Trenton dish up weekly to their sleepy congregations. When the clergy advance to that point that they can edify better than the Sunday paper, there will be no need of resolving against this form of 'Sabbath desecration.' The Sabbath (and Sunday too) was made for man, and the clergy will not be allowed to monopolize it in these United States of America."

The Roman Catholics of New Jersey hav complained for several years that their clergymen hav not been permitted to giv religious instruction to the Roman Catholic children in the State Reform School at Jamesburg, and that Protestant clergymen were given every opportunity to teach all the children. On July 2d a resolution was passed giving a Roman Catholic clergyman the privilege of visiting the school one hour in each week. Trustees Helme and Swain tendered their resignations, and it was said that Supt. Eastman would also resign. Supt. Eastman says that the Rev. Ruesing, the Roman Catholic pastor at Jamesburg, does not go to the Home because he can not giv the children of his faith separate instruction. Of the 314 boys in the institution 130 are Roman Catholics, and the superintendent claims that for the better disciplin of the children they should all be taught by one moral instructor. Another officer of the Home said that clergymen of all denominations could under the rules of the board hold divine service on Sunday, but it must be done under the rules of the management. There is no reason why a Catholic priest should not be allowed to talk to these young convicts, provided, of course, that the convicts are willing. But perhaps when they hav served out the terms to which they hav been sentenced they will feel that they hav satisfied the law without undergoing this additional infliction. Punishment carried too far becomes torture.

The women of Wequetequock, Conn., were some time ago denied the use of the schoolhouse to hold religious revivals on the ground that the crowd which they drew together were in the habit of damaging the interior decorations of the edifice. The gentle damsels thereupon armed themselvs with axes and crowbars, and smashed their way in, overpowering a dozen men who opposed their entrance, and inflicting a crowbar wound upon the hand of the prudential committee. The prudential committee has now called a meeting of the voters of the district to decide whether a suit shall be brought against the assaulters and batterers.

The relief ships Thetis and Bear hav found the survivors of Lieut. Greely's Arctic exploring party. These were seven in number, eighteen of the original twenty-five having died of starvation and exposure. The survivors were found on June 22d, five miles off Cape Sabine, in Smith's Sound, on the coast of west Greenland. The men rescued were at the point of starvation when found. The Greely party had been further north and west and made more important discoveries than any previous explorers in that direction. But for the lack of food the expedition would hav been successful and returned in safety. The expedition sailed from St. Johns, Newfoundland, June 7, 1881.

Communications.

An Antidote Analyzed.

INTRODUCTION.

In the Waynesburg Messenger of May 20, 1884, appeared a lengthy article from the pen of A. G. Cross, in which the writer undertook to "antidote, if may be, the pyæmic poison that drops from the tongues and flows from the pens of modern Freethinkers and so-called Liberalists." Feeling assured that our people had imbibed nothing poisonous from the tongues and pens of Liberals, and fearing that the poisonous slanders and misrepresentations of which his medicine was largely composed might have a deleterious influence upon some of his convalescing patients, I felt it my duty to reply to Mr. Cross in as courteous a manner as the nature of his attack would permit. I did so, and presented my reply to the editor of the Waynesburg Messenger for publication, supposing, of course, that he would have enough respect for fairness and gentlemanly courtesy to extend to me the same privilege he had granted my opponent. But it is with reluctance and a blush of shame for my brother-man that I am compelled to make known this editor's absolute refusal to grant me the rightful privilege of his paper to defend an honest belief, for whose virulent attacks he had freely surrendered more space than I desired. He first refused on the ground that my communication was too long. Besides the article to which mine was a reply, this editor had, in a subsequent issue, published a much longer communication from Mr. Cross on the same subject, and he admitted having another then in type. I explained to him that my article would not occupy as much space as two of Mr. Cross's, and that he could publish it in two issues; and, finally, I agreed to condense it to the length of Mr. Cross's first article. Utterly baffled in this excuse, he was compelled to find another. He then urged that he was running a secular paper, and did not want to get "mixed up" in discussions on religion; that my article would call forth another from Mr. Cross, and I would want to reply to that, and he didn't know where it would stop. He also took the pains to inform me that Mr. Cross's articles were not interesting to his readers; that he wished he had not published them, and that he would not publish any more. Of course this was all very gratifying. But I replied that I didn't know nor care what kind of a paper he might pretend to run; that I was not attempting to introduce any new department in his paper; that if he didn't want to get "mixed up" with religion he had proceeded in a very strange manner when he published three lengthy articles on the subject; that if he intended to exclude such matter from his columns he should have done so when the act would have done no one an injury; that Mr. Cross had presented one side of the question—all I asked was the privilege of presenting the other side. I told him that if he did not regard my article as readable, I should consider him perfectly justifiable in rejecting it, but that if he debarred me from the use of his columns on any other grounds I should consider it a palpable and gross injustice. I also agreed to make the communication final on my part. He admitted my article to be well written, and, thus left without a shadow of an excuse, simply refused.

Now, I am not going to inundate the Waynesburg Messenger and its editor with abusive epithets. On the other hand, I am inclined to view his unkind, unfair action with a great deal of alleviation. I have simply stated the facts, from which all will see his unjust, unfair, uncharitable position.

The majority of the readers of the Messenger are intolerant Christians, who, this editor no doubt feels, would ostracize him were he to publish my communications; and I suppose his fears are not altogether unfounded. Do not understand me as justifying him on this ground. I merely mention this consideration as palliating in some degree the unfairness of his act. He is now a slave to an intolerant, tyrannical master. I hope to see the day when I can grasp him by the hand as a free and honest fellow-Liberal, unfettered by the chains of bigoted superstition, untrammeled by the fear of an intolerant patronage, and unbiased by the voice of popular opinion. That day of emancipation is rapidly approaching, and I hope the editor of the Messenger may liv to enjoy its beneficent influence.

I have sworn unceasing warfare against a system of religion that I believe to be absurd, pernicious, and revolting. Justice forbid that I, like my Christian foes, should wage this warfare with bigotry and intolerance!

Being debarred from the rightful medium for presenting my reply to Mr. Cross, I present it in the following pages, just as written for the Messenger. All I ask of my readers is a fair and impartial examination of its contents. Having granted me that courtesy, they are at liberty to praise or condemn, as their better judgment prompts. I am in earnest, and solely desirous of knowing the truth. To those who are willing to point out in a kind and gentlemanly manner what they consider my errors, I am ever ready to give my most courteous attention. We would kindly ask those who are so fond of wielding the weapons of abuse to think before they aim their poisoned shafts at the hearts of earnest, honest men.

H. CLAY LUSE.

Waynesburg, Pa., June 15, 1884.

LIBERALISM.

MR. EDITOR:

"The mousing owl may strike, but the eagle's flight is above its reach, and his sunlit home far beyond the strength of its feeble vision."

Just so.

There are brave and honest men who hav dared to substitute the torch of reason for the darkness of credulity; who, instead of crushing their first honest, intelligent doubt with the leaden weight of bigotry, have searched diligently for its foundation and found it firmly planted on the indestructible pillar of reason; who have weighed the evidence and found the Christian religion to be unsupported by anything that appeals to unprejudiced intelligence as worthy of belief; who are proud of the term Infidel so opprobrious to some, and who frankly voice their sentiments in spite of flippant scorn and heartless tyranny.

These men have too much humanity, too much noble manhood, to be affected by the invective and misrepresentation of persons who may differ from them in opinion.

Let the "mousing owl" strike—and hoot, too, for that matter.

The Infidel has built his home with justice, mercy, and human kindness on the sunlit rock of reason, far beyond the "feeble vision" of those who have no defense for their "striking" save that of waning popularity.

"Now and then somebody examines, and in spite of all keeps his manhood, and has the courage to follow where his reason leads. Then the wise get together and repeat wise saws, and exchange knowing nods and most prophetic winks. The stupidly wise sit owl-like on the dead limbs of the tree of knowledge and solemnly hoot."

Dr. A. G. Cross has felt called by duty to administer an antidote to those who may have imbibed "the pyæmc poison which drops from the tongues and flows from the pens of modern Freethinkers and so-called Liberalists."

Well, giving antidotes is in the line of the doctor's profession, and he is certainly to be commended for endeavoring to prolong the life of the "most intelligent and benevolent religion known to mankind." Nor should he be censured because the antidote fails to do the work intended. The physician administers the medicine that his better judgement teaches him will be most effectual, and if the disease proves an incurable one, he has, at least, done his duty.

Mr. Cross is not to blame because his religion is not capable of a strong defense. It is a matter of surprise, however, that intelligent men should believe in a religion capable of no stronger defense than the applause of its growth and popularity, and the vilification and gross misrepresentation of its opponents. This is the defense he has presented. It is the one hurled from every pulpit in the land.

Man, from an inherent quality of his nature, is loath to place himself in a position conspicuously different from the majority of his fellow-men. Most especially is this true when such a position will bring upon him the contemptuous sneers and ridicule of a multitude of good but thoughtless people. Preachers realize this fact, and it is the weapon with which they keep the cowering, thoughtless, superstitious multitude within their folds. They flaunt before their credulous congregations the great prestige and influence of the Christian religion. They throw themselves into a storm of pathos and extol the so-called beneficent results of Christianity. They roll up the whites of their eyes and bawl about the love and mercy of Jehovah, the infamous character of Infidels, and the danger and wickedness of Infidel teachings. Thus they wind their accursed chains of fear around the innocent hearts of childhood and crush the youthful intellect with burdens of prejudice and bigotry, and then exclaim: "See what a power we are!"

We should certainly not presume to dispute with a learned M.D. as to what is poison and what is not. He ought to know. Yet we would commend to his consideration whether or not he may hav, at a casual glance, mistaken something for poison that is just the opposite. We ask that before giving any more antidote he give this material that he is pleased to term pyæmic poison a more careful analysis than the substance of the antidote already prescribed would indicate.

I should be pleased to notice some of the pyæmic poison that has dropped from the tongues and flowed from the pens of that little army of grand and noble souls who have stood up for truth and humanity. But I fear I should take up too much space, so I desist. I simply ask you to search the writings of such men as Robert G. Ingersoll, H. W. Longfellow, Jas. E. Emerson, D. M. Bennett, and Chas. Darwin, and if you don't succeed in finding any poison, turn to the "book of books," and read the twenty-third chapter of Ezekiel.

The doctor's article is so filled with disgusting misrepresentation that I am loath to wade through it; but it is by such misrepresentation that a great many people are deceived. The ingredients of the antidote seem to be: praise and misrepresentation of Christianity, denunciation and misrepresentation of Infidelity.

Here is the way the good doctor does up Infidelity: "If Infidelity was a positiv institution, if it had any documentary proof, then it might be a subject for argument; but as it is a mere negation, and consists wholly in the rejection of testimony, the repudiation of evidence, and the denial of facts, logical, argumentative, and inductive reasoning is out of the question."

Easy, isn't it? Just as easy as rolling off a log to disprove of it in that way. After writing the above long sentence I imagine I can see the antidotal sage lean back in his chair, draw a long sigh of relief, and soliloquize thus: "Ah, how nicely I have disposed of that! Now I shall not be expected to notice any of those Infidel arguments that puzzle me so, but I can go on and misrepresent Infidelity and laud Christianity to my heart's content."

Now, doctor, there are a few things that we Infidels do not just understand. Of course we would not ask a man so wise, so learned, so logical, as yourself to come down from your high pinnacle of logic and attempt to argue with us. But you have asked a few questions which we shall endeavor to answer in the course of our letter. Will you be kind enough to answer some of the questions Infidels are constantly asking? If you will answer them satisfactorily, we think you might do great good for your cause; and we think you could conscientiously depart from your high standard of logic for a few moments in order to do so good a work. Don't say, "All the so-called arguments of Infidels have been answered." That's too much like the schoolboy who, when he doesn't like to admit his inability to answer the question asked him, says, "I know, but you know, too, and I don't want to tell."

"Is darkness anything but the absence of light?" asks the learned, logical doctor. If we take science and common sense for our guide, no. If we take the Bible as authority, yes. Notice: "And God said, Let there be light, and there was light. And God saw the light that it was good; and God divided the light from the darkness." If this means anything, it means that light and darkness were two distinct substances that God could mix up and divide at his will. We are not told where he put the light nor where he put the darkness—or absence of light—but he divided them. He did this, too, before he created the sun. After he had made the sun and moon and the other heavenly bodies, he set them in the firmament "to divide the light from the darkness." Since he had already made this division, this office of the heavenly bodies would seem unnecessary.

Infidels cannot understand how the earth and the whole planetary system could have been created in six days. Scientific knowledge and common sense give the lie to the statement. Infidels take the position that the permament, indestructible, unchangeable phenomena of nature are much stronger proofs than an old, patched, contradictory, unreasonable, easily changed, anonymous, combination of poetry, fable, and obscenity. Infidels would like to know how you reconcile the absurdities of this book with the character ascribed to the one who is claimed to be its author. If you consider the days of the creation story as "good whiles," Infidels would like to know what your author meant by bounding each of them with an evening and a morning. If the seventh day was a "good while" of millions of years, didn't God take a long rest? And since he blessed and sanctified that "good while," and commanded us to keep it holy, should our Sabbath extend through millions of years instead of twenty-four hours? If "day" means "good while" in this particular instance, why does it not mean the same in all the writings of Moses?

Infidels would like to know if you believe the world is only six thousand years old. According to the Bible, it is but six thousand years since its creation. Do you believe it?

Is God omniscient? If so, didn't he know when the slimy serpent was in the garden enticing one of his children? If so, why didn't he kill the serpent, or invite his snakeship out? He is omniscient, and must have known what his serpent was at. He is omnipotent, and could have prevented the interview. Yet he did not. As a consequence, thousands of us poor mortals are going to hell every year. Are we to conclude that God is all-merciful? Tell us frankly, doctor, is this in accordance with your ideas of mercy? But he sent his only son from above to die for us, and atone for our sins. Oh, did he? Well, what kind of justice and mercy is that? Do not nature and all established laws of justice teach us that punishment should be inflicted upon the transgressor and not upon one who is innocent? Here are two violations of this simple, self-evident law of justice. We can be in no degree responsible for Adam's sins, yet God compels us to suffer for them. We do not hesitate to say that this is the most despicable, heartless violation of justice recorded of gods or men. Think of millions of men suffering on account of the sins of one man whom they never knew except through the pages of history! Justice? Mercy? What is justice? What is mercy? To accommodate the Bible we must have new definitions for the terms. Again—Christ could have been in no way responsible for our sins, yet God punished him on account of them. Infidel as I am, bad as the Christians would make me, I want to incur the punishment that follows my transgression. I want no innocent one to suffer for my folly. Accursed and despised be the doctrin that one man's sufferings may atone for another's sins!

In Gen. vi, 5, we read: "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowl of the air; for it repenteth me that I have made them."

What kind of omnipotence is it that couldn't make a perfect man? What kind of godliness is it that would create a world and place a man and woman of his own creation on it and command them to be fruitful and multiply, and when they had obeyed the commandment to such an extent that the world became abundantly populated, would, at that late day, repent that man had been made, and decide to destroy "man and beast and creeping thing, and the fowl of the air" from the face of the earth? If man was a failure, whose mistake was it? Didn't God make him? What kind of a God is it that would get mad because something he had made didn't turn out as his omniscience expected, and drown a whole world of innocent people, including the inoffensive brutes of the field and fowls of the air? Being responsible for man's existence here, God ought certainly to have sent him back to the oblivion whence he had brought him without the infliction of pain. Why didn't he take them up to heaven as he did Elijah?

But he didn't drown everybody. Noah and his three sons and their wives he saved as the select few with which to people again the world. Now, in selecting this man whose progeny were to scatter over the whole world, we should naturally have expected God to select a perfect men. But if this were impossible, why didn't he kill Noah, too, and try his hand on making another mud man? He could certainly not have made a much worse failure than he did in his first attempt when he pronounced his work good. But I suppose he had run out of the right kind of mud or something, so he preferred to take a new start with Noah. ~~But Noah was a drunkard (Gen. ix, 21).~~ Maybe Noah deceived God and made him think he was a better man than he was. However this may be, we have to record another signal failure of omnipotence, omniscience, and infinit good to people a world without wickedness. God drowned a whole world full of people in order to get clear of wickedness, and then spoiled the whole business by saving a drunkard, and wickedness still exists. No telling how soon he will get mad at himself again and send us into oblivion.

Infidels would like to know if you believe that God had sense enough to know he was calling himself a fool when he inspired Solomon to write (Eccl. viii, 9), "Anger resteth in the bosom of fools." Lest you should deny that he did so, we shall ask you to turn to Jer. viii, 20, and read, "Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold mine anger and my fury shall be poured out upon this place, upon man and beast, and upon the trees of the field, and upon the fruit of the ground, and it shall burn and it shall not be quenched."

Nice business for a God that says, "Anger resteth in the bosom of fools," isn't it? He pours out his anger and fury upon the dumb brutes and senseless trees!

Number xxi, 4: "The Lord said unto Moses, take all the heads of the people and hang them up before the Lord against the sun, that the fierce anger of the Lord may be turned away from Israel."

In 1 Chron. xiii, 7–10, we read that some of God's people had God's ark in a cart, and Uzza was acting as God's ox-driver, and because "the oxen stumbled," Uzza very naturally and innocently put forth his hand to hold the cart; and the anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzza, and he smote him because he put his hand to the ark; and there he died before God." In the same book, xvi, 34, we find this: "O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good; for his mercy endureth forever."

We are continually reading in the "book divine" of God's anger being kindled against somebody or something. Yet God is omniscient and "anger resteth in the bosom of fools."

Is it wise for a man to become angry with a dog and vent his wrath upon him in blows and kicks? Do we not rather admire the tranquil wisdom and mercy of that great man, Sir Isaac Newton, who, when his dog Diamond overset a candle among his papers and destroyed the almost finished labor of many years, only exclaimed, "O Diamond, Diamond, thou little knowest the mischief thou hast done?" The knowledge of man compared with that of God must be less significant than the knowledge of the dog compared with that of man. Is it wise for an omnipotent God to become angry with man—a little pigmy of his creation whom he can control at will?

Lest the doctor should become forgetful of the goodness and mercy of his God, I shall quote a few more extracts from that wonderful book.

Ezekiel ix, 5, 6: "Go ye after him through the city and smite; let not your eye spare, neither have ye pity. Slay utterly old and young, both maids and little children and women."

If God gave such a command as that, I wonder what kind of a command the devil would have given.

Isaiah xiii, 16: "Their children also shall be dashed to pieces before their eyes; their homes shall be spoiled and their wives ravished."

Hosea xiii, 16: "Samaria shall become desolate; for she hath rebelled against her God; they shall fall by the sword; their children shall be dashed to pieces and their women with child shall be ripped up."

"God is love."

Infidels would like to know what kind of love it is that inspires such indiscriminate butchery as this.

Infidels would like to know how Christians are going to make peace with their God for keeping the first day of the week as Sabbath instead of the seventh, as the Bible distinctly commands.

There are thousands of other things they would like to have explained, but for the present we must desist.

We have taken a few extracts from the book upon which your religion rests, and which you claim was given by divine inspiration. If we have not misquoted, and if the conclusions we have drawn from our quotations are just, then your religion is worthy of the contempt of every intelligent, honest human being.

We ask, in all kindness, that, in your next "antidote," you either show where we have misquoted, or drawn unjust conclusions, or else come out frankly and admit that you too are an Infidel.

"Ten years ago, when Christianity was filling Christian lands with her divine beneficence; when the clergy were learned, pious, and zealous; when the laity were devout, liberal, and abundant in their charities—then, without a reasonable provocation, but from sheer hatred of the truth and malignity against Christ and his church, the Infidels of Europe and America combined to overthrow the most intelligent and benevolent religion known to mankind."

Shame on you, doctor! Have you no better defense for the religion you so highly extol, than these ~~childish, malignant slanders against its antagonists~~? So plainly are they slanders that they need no reply. Why should Infidels hate truth? Why should Infidels hate Christ and his church? Is not unbelief in Christ the only thing that could cause any one to hate him? If he were the meek, loving Jesus you endeavor to represent him, would we not naturally love instead of hate him? Do you suppose you will get the world to believe that such men as Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Tyndall, Haeckel, Carlyle, Arnold, Ingersoll, Emerson, Longfellow—men whose whole lives have been devoted to a search for truth—do you, I ask, expect anybody will believe these men to be haters of truth?

About parallel with what we have quoted above is the sentence in which the doctor speaks of "men who try to be unbelievers." The doctor knows very well that a man's will has nothing to do with his belief, except it may prevent him from examining proofs. If he examines the evidence, he may will what he pleases, but his belief will be in accordance with what reason dictates. Did I believe in the Christian religion, and, at the same time, speak of it as I do, I should feel sure of an incontestable title to the warmest corner of hell. So, I say, once for all, the very fact that a man openly professes Infidelity is absolute proof of his sincerity; while professions of Christianity carry with them no evidence of sincerity except that which rests in our confidence in the professor's honesty. There are many reasons why weak-kneed, unscrupulous Infidels should clothe themselves in the popular robes of Christianity; but none why the Christian should make professions that he must believe will send himself, and perhaps others, to hell.

All the doctor's verbosity in endeavoring to show that Christianity is influential and widely believed might have been spared. We have never denied this. But whether a cause has three hundred or three hundred million followers has nothing to do with its justness. Everybody believed once that the earth was flat and stationary, but you see that didn't make it so. The followers of Mohammed number about 200,000,000. Brahmans numbers about 175,000,000. Buddhism has a following of about 500,000,000. These religions make a good showing in spite of the vast amount of time and money spent in Christian missionary work.

The doctor's figures to show that Christians' hearts are in their cause are also unnecessary. We have always admitted that they have much more heart than brain in their cause. So faithful is the Mussulman to his religion that he will toil out in the hot sun all day without putting a particle of food or water between his lips. He does this to please his god, and I doubt not he is sincere. In our late war the Southern people put their hearts so earnestly into their cause as to sacrifice much wealth and many lives in its defense. Yet we have never considered these facts as evidence that the Mussulman has the true religion or that human slavery was a just institution.

Had the assault upon Fort Sumter continued to the present time, and had the defense proved equal to the attack, could the government of the United States, in the face of Europe and all the world, rightfully claim a substantial victory?"

By no means. It is not wise to count chickens before they are hatched; neither is it wise to count victories before they are won. If the Confederates had continued their attack on Fort Sumter until to-day, and had found, and should still find, their own forces strengthening and those of the enemy weakening, could they not reasonably expect that victory would finally be theirs?

We know not whence the doctor gleans his statistics to show the progress and following of the Christian religion, but it is unimportant. We do know that Christian statements in regard to these matters do not harmonize. You will notice he gives the population under Christian governments. I suppose the doctor calls this a Christian government, yet a Christian paper is responsible for the statement that nearly fourty-four per cent of our people are unbelievers. It is not difficult to get accessions to a popular belief from the ranks of the unthinking and ignorant, no matter how unreasonable that belief. Yet we wonder how many of the four million claimed to have been received into the church remained in it.

If I were to tell you that Christianity is a waning power you would not believe me, because I am a wicked blasphemer—an Infidel. So I shall let the Christian pulpit and press do it for me.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher says, "There is among educated thinkers a growing impression that Christianity is losing its hold upon men, and that the church is a waning power."

Says the Rev. Mr. Newman, of the Methodist church, Washington, D. C.: "Within the next decade, aye, within the next five years, Christianity will be tried as it was never tried before. There are men in England and America to-day who will bring to the assault a ripeness of intellect and a breadth of view unequaled by the past."

The Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage exclaims: "Oh, we have magnificent church machinery in this country; we have 60,000 American ministers; we have costly music; we hav great Sunday-schools, and yet I give you the appalling statistics that in the last twenty-five years the churches of God have averaged less than two conversions a year each. There has been an average of four or five deaths in the churches. How soon at this rate will this world be brought to God? We gain two, we lose four. Eternal God! what will this come to?"

Bishop Gilmore, one of the ablest Catholic divines says: "Religion is fast passing away. . . The crowds that hasten to listen to a Beecher preaching a religion without Christ, and applaud an Ingersoll preaching bold and open Infidelity, tell in words that find no contradiction whither we are drifting."

Said the late Rev. Dr. H. W. Bellows: "If you believe what the men of science, the philosophers, the poets, and the critics believe, you cannot believe, except in a general way, in what the creeds and churches generally profess."

The Rev. David Watson wails thus: "The great, and the wise, and the mighty are not with us. . . These men, the master minds and imperial leaders among men, the Comtes, tne Carlyles, the Goethes, tho Emersons, the Humboldts, the Tyndalls, the Huxleys, if you will, are called by us Atheists, are outside our most Christian church."

The New York Times gives testimony: "Many feel as if a tremendous wave of skepticism was sweeping over the intellectual world of England and America, and carrying away all the oldest and most revered landmarks, and in this calamity they find the younger and more enthusiastic minds especially involved."

Smilar expressions of "priests of the dying faith" could be quoted almost ad infinitum. But we desist. What is the matter with the doctor's figures? In the face of such a "glorious showing," what mean these wails and lamentations?

Having finished his long line of figures, the doctor proceeds:

"Can Infidelity, with all its boastings, make a corresponding showing? How many temples has it reared? Has it dedicated one? It once had a shrine in the great metropolitan city of New York; but that has disappeared from the face of the community. Can it boast of a solitary regular convocation? It once had a temple in Boston, but that fell under the sheriff's hammer. How many journals does it maintain? Can it point to one influential paper? And what is its literature? Has it publishing houses of which it might be proud? The books which it has printed, are they not a drug on the market? And what of its annual gatherings?"

It is plain, doctor, that you know almost nothing about Liberalism. We shall endeavor to give you some light.

You want to know if we can make a corresponding showing with Christians. So far as the string of figures is concerned, we cannot; but in the matter of progress the showing is much more encouraging and hopeful.

Have we not grounds for encouragement in the wails and deploring appeals that are welling up from the Christian pulpit and press? Have we not a glorious showing when men of the Christian cloth admit that the great, the wise, and the mighty are not with them, but with us? And do you blame us for boasting that the great scholarly thinkers of the age are outside the church? Is it not something of which we may be proud that the men who achieve the greatest results in the way of education and knowledge are the men who have least faith in the Christian religion? Cast into oblivion the names of Paine, Franklin, Jefferson, Adams, Madison, Hamilton, Lincoln, Garrison, Phillips, Comte, Humboldt, Goethe, Shelley, Byron, Burns, Gibbon, Hume, Voltaire, Carlyle, Emerson, Arnold, Longfellow, Mill, Huxley, Darwin, Tyndall, Haeckel, Spencer, and Draper—blot these names from the pages of history, and what a blank it leaves! Infidels, every one of them! Some of them were not antagonistic to Christianity, but none of them believed or do now believe in its fundamental teachings.

In 1836 Abner Kneeland was tried in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts for blasphemy. The prosecution was based upon these words uttered by Mr. Kneeland in his paper, the Investigator, "He believes in a God, which I do not." Mr. Kneeland in his defense claimed that the comma was erroneously inserted after "God," and that it was not his intention to express disbelief in a God, but belief in a different God from that of his opponent. He was, nevertheless, convicted and imprisoned. To-day there are thousands of people in the United States openly avowing disbelief in any God without the least fear of punishment. Then Kneeland's Investigator was the only Freethought journal in America. To-day we publish and support scores of Liberal papers. To-day we have nearly three hundred Liberal Leagues that hold meetings and work in harmony with the National Liberal League. But our greatest achievements probably lie within the church herself. The churches are drifting away from orthodoxy and preaching more of humanity. Like the tadpole, they are gradually losing their tails, and we hope ere long to see them come out full-developed Infidel frogs. Preachers are dropping a tenet here and a tenet there in their creeds until some of them have very little of Christianity left except the name. Beechers and Savages and Newtons are becoming more and more numerous and are carrying large congregations with them. Brilliant leaders in the church—Chaineys, Milns, Reynoldses, Burnhams—are stepping out into the broad sunlight of Freethought.

Have we influential papers? THE TRUTH SEEKER has climbed up from an eight-page monthly to a sixteen-page weekly, has a wide and profitable circulation, a list of able and scholarly contributors, and is an influential paper. The Boston Investigator was founded in 1830 by Abner Kneeland, and is to-day a strong and influential paper. Lucifer, Man, the Radical Review, the Ironclad Age, the Independent Pulpit, and many other influential and progressive papers make out the list.

Have we publishing houses of which we might be proud? The Truth Seeker Company have a large publishing house in New York, and the Boston Investigator has one in Boston, and from the prosperous business they are doing we should judge their publications are by no means a drug on the market. What temples have we reared? Have we dedicated one? Let us see. Josiah P. Mendum occupies part of Paine Memorial as a publishing house, and probably knows at least as much about it as the doctor; so we will let him describe it:

"This fine building, devoted to Liberalism, is located on Appleton street, in the city of Boston, Mass. It is a very attractive place for lectures, discussions, meetings, concerts, and assemblies of a social and national character. Here the friends of progress meet together, and in a friendly manner present and defend their different views on religious, political, reformatory, or conservative measures.

"Paine Memorial is a large brick building with stone trimmings, five stories high, and contains three large, convenient, well-lighted halls, viz., Investigator Hall, Paine Hall, and Kneeland Hall, with waiting and retiring rooms, and large pleasant parlors. On the lower or ground floor are two stores, one of which is occupied as the Liberal bookstore, connected with the Boston Investigator. The editorial and composing rooms occupy a part of the upper story of the edifice, from the top of which the visitor may have a fine view of the city of Boston and its suburbs.

"The land on which the memorial stands was purchased in the spring of 1874, and on the 4th of July following the corner-stone was laid with appropriate ceremonies. The work was pushed forward from that time with rapidity, and on the 29th of January, 1875, the anniversary of the birthday of Thomas Paine, it was dedicated with interesting exercises adapted to the occasion, a large congregation of Liberals being present.

"A building like Paine Memorial standing on a prominent street in a large city, with a marble bust of Thomas Paine on its front, and marble tablets containing many of his mottoes placed so conspicuously that the passer-by is attracted and stops to read them, and thereby learns the sentiments the author-hero held, must do very much to disabuse the slanders against Mr. Paine, and teach the public what kind of a man he was. The Memorial is a fitting tribute to the patriotism of Thomas Paine, as an apostle of civil and religious liberty, and a useful structure where lessons of Liberalism and Freethought are taught every week. We hope similar edifices may soon be erected in every state in the Union, and the public learn to appreciate truth without error, bigotry, or superstition."

Speaking of the last Freethinkers' Convention at Rochester, N. Y., the doctor says: "But as I happen to know something of that convention, let us open the door and look in upon it." Then follows a jumbling of stuff that is too childish and silly, as well as too vilely false, to quote. Be honest, now, doctor—what do you know about that convention? Were you there? You didn't glean that stuff you have given us from any of the secular press of Rochester, which gave us fair and favorable reports. You didn't get it from the Sun or Herald. Where did you get it, anyhow? Do you expect anybody to believe it? Ah, no; instead of opening the door of that convention you have opened the door of your biased brain and revealed a huge propensity for silly misrepresentation. You failed to tell us that Christians had a representative in that convention, in the person of Rev. Thos. Mitchell, who in response to a kind invitation from Liberals was there to defend Christianity against T. B. Wakeman. You failed to tell that he proved unequal to Mr. Wakeman in debate, yet had manhood enough to give a favorable account of the convention. His words were, "I was never treated better in my life." You failed to tell that such distinguished men as Chas. Watts, of England; Hon. Elizur Wright, Dr. T. L. Brown, George Chainey, Samuel P. Putnam, John E. Remsburg, Courtlandt Palmer, and others, spoke from that stage. You failed to tell us that among the list of speakers were the names of Mrs. Judge Mattie Krekel, Susan H. Wixon, Amelia H. Colby, and other cultured, intelligent ladies.

Before you attempt to enlighten the people in regard to Liberalism again, in justice to your readers please learn something of it yourself.

To my readers I would say before closing that I have adopted as my creed these words of Thomas Paine: "I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy." I can no better express my rule of action than with these words of William Lloyd Garrison: "I will be as harsh as truth, as uncompromising as justice. . . I am in earnest; I will not equivocate; I will not excuse; I will not retreat a single inch, and I will be heard." And with Emerson, "We feel that in all directions the light is breaking; that reason, the noblest and purest religion, will find its abiding home in our institutions." H. CLAY LUSE.

Dr. McCosh and the Question of Evil.

It is told of Dr. McCosh, of Princeton, that once, lecturing before the senior class on Leibnitz's theory of the reason of evil, he was interrupted with the question, "Well, doctor, why was evil ever introduced into the world, anyway?" "Ah," he replied, "you hav asked the hardest question in all philosophy. Socrates tried to answer it, and failed; Plato tried it, and he failed; Kant attempted it, and made bad work of it; Leibnitz tried it, as I hav been telling you, and he begged the whole question; and I confess I don't know what to make of it myself."

The above extract was cut from our sage daily, the New York Tribune. What do its conductors mean by dragging before the public the reverend doctor in this ridiculous manner? I can hardly believe the event took place as here represented. Why, sir, its answer involves the whole authenticity of Mosaic history of creation; and to answer which, honestly and conscientiously, would absolutely be taking a mean advantage of the doctor's orthodox position.

The great difficulty with all our theologic pundits is, their calling compels them to stumble at the idea of a sudden creation of everything in nature our eyes behold. They become perplexed at the operations and evidences of the universal law of progress everywhere surrounding us. But the bold, untrammeled thinker will not cramp or limit his observations of the developments of nature in the matter of time to millions on millions of cycles of years, even if he has to trace creation backward into the misty realms of imagination. He is greatly encouraged in his researches as he finds fashionable theology based on a venerable absurdity. This is peculiarly an age for the examination of first principles, both physically and morally.

The thinker, without attempting to examin into the antiquity of spirit or matter, or on their unity, observes that in tracing nature retrospectivly, even into its atomic condition, every entity, either in mind or matter, exists, and always has existed, as a duality; that every entity is composed of two activ elements which might be designated as its positiv or negativ condition. Or, to be more clear, everything, to exist at all, needs its counter or opposit. Electricity could not act without its negativ. Heat needs its opposit, cold. Bitter must hav its sweet. Light must hav its darkness. Strength must hav its weakness, wisdom its folly, pleasure its pain, goodness its evil — the great puzzle of the reverend doctor. Everything exists in resultant quality only comparativly, as either of these two elements are in excess. Even vice is virtue in excess.

Even man, in the examination of his own mind as a metaphysical being, finds himself a duality. He finds he possesses these two elementary principles. He is never alone; he is in constant debate with himself. He is ever thriving for the accomplishment of some desire, some personal gratification.

Man deserves the highest condition of happiness; a blissful tranquility, but there is an activ, restless spirit within him always at war; "self-love to wage, but reason to restrain." And when he trenches on the healthy condition of his own nature, or the rights of his fellow-man, he becomes wicked, and sinful, and the abhorence of the sanctified, and instantly requires the prayers of all the saints to restore his moral tranquility. Even in the spirit domain, if man expects to loll about listlessly in a condition of blissful inactivity, he will find himself mistaken. There cannot be imagined a condition of inactivity. Antagonism is the propelling principle of progress.

Will our thoughtful sister, Elmina, rise and enlighten us and the doctor about this "resting in Jesus?"

The Hurst Phenomena.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: At this season I am more adept at dipping the oar than the pen, but the tricks of the "Georgia Wonder" hav lured me to spend an evening in the city; and as I had the pleasure of being "waltzed" around the floor with a chair, under her smiling yet irresistible influence, I felt like coming forward to testify in her behalf. Let me first say that, after viewing a whole performance, and experiencing a part of it, I was fully convinced that she is no humbug, trickster, or athlete; and though she has more opportunity than anyone else to know and feel the manifestation of the "power," she really knows no more of its how and why than do her subjects or her audiences.

My personal observations lead me to formulate the following propositions:

1. No one ought to publish their views about Miss Hurst's power without experiencing its influence.

2. A strong man will become "winded," wet with perspiration, and considerably exhausted by from three to five minutes' effort in opposition to her power.

3. Miss Hurst will wrestle with from thirty to fifty men during two hours without any evidence of having exerted muscular power.

4. Her power is manifestly greater with some than with others, and with a few she fails.

5. It is not always the heavy-weight or athlete with whom she fails; and most such hav succumbed to her power.

6. A strong man can do most of her feats, but not without very evident muscular effort, as manifested by contortions of countenance, braced positions of body, reddening face, and panting breath.

7. Her exhibition of holding a chair from the floor with only one hand on it while four or five men struggled to put it down, and of raising a chair with a heavy man in it, simply by placing the palms of her hands on the back of it, cannot be imitated by the most muscular man.

8. In trying to hold a chair quiet while her hands are upon it, one is not aware of any mental influence or mesmeric effect, but if he makes up his mind to hold to the chair he feels that he must go with it.

9. The motions do not seem to be guided by her, nor to hav any intelligent or wise direction; the movements are forcible this way and that, while she merely follows about to keep her hands on the chair.

10. With her hands placed over those of her subject, when any muscular effort would surely be felt by him, the manifestation of power is sometimes just as evident as when her hands are on the cane or chair.

The explanation of all this is "easier said than done." The wiseacres and quack wits hav their say, as usual, and some of them hav even essayed to imitate; but I saw Dr. Forrest's ridiculous efforts, and it is a pity he could not hav been where I was to see himself, and to compare his own awkward exhibitions of brace and pull with her graceful and easy attitudes.

I claim only to be an unprejudiced observer, and hav no explanation to offer. Naturally, I am so constituted that I always endeavor to trace phenomena to natural causes, believing there is no supernatural, but I am not of those who think they know it all, and that the substance and forces of nature hav no new surprises for us.

The Hurst phenomena are not new or unparalleled. A French girl did similar things in 1864, as investigated by competent observers and reported in the Atlantic Monthly of that year, and it is being reported from various parts of the United States that other women are able to rival Miss Hurst. The phenomena are no more wonderful and obscure than were the first discoveries of electrical force, and may yet be shown to be related to it.

We know the earth is full of activ currents of force and latent supplies, and we hav knowledge of some methods of calling them forth. Perhaps Miss Hurst, without knowing how to do it, has the knack of drawing upon these forces for certain irregular manifestations of power, and it may be that we shall all some day acquire the art for useful practical purposes. Mr. Burt, long a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but now deceased, fully believed that he could, by his will, influence natural forces of earth and air, and Miss Hurst's will power has done more than all his assertions did to make me think there's something in it. It is important that all man's latent faculties and powers should be understood and developed, and, perhaps, by the time humanity shall be evoluted so far as to be safely intrusted with a will power over the forces of nature, we shall all be endowed as Miss Hurst is, but more liberally, and with a more intelligent control of it. Yours truly,

Larchmont, N. Y. E. B. FOOTE, JR.

The Land War.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of May 24th I told your readers that the land war had commenced. The following slip sent me by one of your readers, of Leavenworth, Kansas, will show how the war is progressing:

Correspondence of the Kansas City Times.

ARKANSAS CITY, KAN., April 18, 1884.—One of the most remarkable cyclones that ever visited this section of the country, and at the same time the most perfect in its demolition, swept over that portion of the "Cherokee strip" just south of this section of the Kansas line last Sunday night, and, returning, was equally destructiv and remarkable on the following night. It was remarkable because of its narrow width, zig-zag course, and peculiar destructivness. It was not more than a foot wide and about in the shape of a Virginia worm fence, destroyed fencing, tearing down posts, and, in some cases, absolutely pulling out the holes.

Your special took a ride to the scene and found the description inadequate to the facts. He found twenty miles of barbed wire fencing down, the posts awry, the stays gone, and in some cases the holes obliterated. Close examination revealed the fact that every panel of the wire was neatly, sharply, cut close to the post, as though done with nippers, and every strand lying on the ground. The posts had, some of them, been pulled out and were missing, as well as all the stays.

Just inside the Kansas line, across the road from the north side of this fence, were found two heaps—about a car load—of barbed wire on spools, which was to hav been shortly used in fencing more pasture. This had been set fire to and literally burnt up. I could hardly believe it possible until examination explained: The wire is wound on pine spools and is then immersed in coal-tar, as a paint. Kerosene had been poured into the tube of the spools and over the heaps. Ignition was powder-like and combustion easy. In each heap were burnt holes through to the ground, the melted metal running together like lava, looking not unlike cooled "lob-lolly." [I express you a lump taken from the pile.] The little not melted was totally ruined; of the car load of barbed wire not a yard is fit for use.

Immediately on the line between Kansas and the "Cherokee strip" in the Indian Territory—but inside of this state—is a line of thriving farms, whose owners hav snatched from the desert and made to blossom like the rose their acres of Kansas soil. A common road separates these farms from the barbed wire fencing of the Standard Oil Company. Long miles of the jagged cruelty stretch annoyingly before these hardy tillers of the soil, shutting out from their stock the green fat of unlimited pasture and completely cutting off the timber. To add insult to injury a car load of wire for further use in fencing the twenty-five miles square for the Standard Oil Company had been dumped down right in the front yard of one of them.

Mutterings of distant thunder had been heard; lately it grew portentously; and last Monday and Tuesday nights the remarkable cyclone above described burst upon that fence, followed it all the way round the twenty miles, cut every panel, only pausing in its sweep to send a lightning streak into those heaps of barbed wire in that mad farmer's front yard.

The agent of the Standard Oil company immediately put United States Marshals Reed and Rarick on the hunt after the cyclone. Evidence, sure, was found against six men, and the agent, Pink Fouts, posted to Winfield (the county seat) to consult the company's attorney, W. P. Hackney, Esq., who told them he knew of no redress. He hasted to Wichita to get United States Commissioner Hatton to issue warrants; but he told him he had no power to do so. In final despair he telegraphed to United States Attorney Hallowell, at Topeka, but he electrified Agent Fouts with the message: "No law to cover the case; the stock association are trespassers, as were all other stock men on that strip."

The agent returned and reported to the anxious deputy marshals, Reed and Rarick, "We are beat and could do nothing; but we will get a law passed that will cover the case." Imagin the feelings of the expectant marshals. The penalty was said to be $500 in each case, and here went $3,000 up the flume as quickly as that fence went down.

Congress and the land-grabbers, you see, committed the first offense. Congress first encouraged and sanctioned the great sin of stealing land, and then the land thieves, in their greed, fenced in the land of actual settlers with the land they had stolen. The settlers had to cut the fences to pass out and in, and then the grabbers burnt the cabins of the settlers; and now the settlers hav made made a greater destruction of the fences. And so the war will probably go on until the railroad stations and the habitations of rich land-grabbers will be blown up higher than kites.

Congress in one hour's time could stop all this, kill land speculation, and make land entirely worthless, as it should be, except to those who want to cultivate it with their own hands. But there are so many thieves in Congress who hav in their own hands large tracts of stolen land that they will not enact the necessary laws, and the war will probably go on until the land thieves are killed off. And now it is the duty of every worker, at whatever occupation, to be careful who they vote for in the future. Let none vote for a president, nor any other officer, until he has publicly given a solemn pledge that he will use his utmost endeavors to hav all the public land reserved to be given in farm lots to those who will cultivate it without the labor of hired slaves. Will my friends in all parts of the Union send me papers containing any article on the land question, either for or against free lands, with the articles marked? J. HACKER.

Magian Myths.

To Mr. Lincoln, whose interesting paper on Freemason mysteries appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 24th, I would apply for information about Mithras, the details of whose mythology escaped my notice, if they exist either in the studies of Dupuis, "Origine de tous les Cultes," in those of Auquetel du Perron on the Zend books, or other memoirs such as I could find in the library of Harvard University. Ignorance of German prevented my consulting other works particularly recommended to me by Theodore Parker, and with which your kindred range of study has probably familiarized you.

From what slight mention I found of Mithras, I inferred that he was regarded like Apollo, as the sun spirit, and that to him must attach the esoteric or spiritual sense attached to the fire-worship ceremonial; but concerning his connection with Oromasd, I found nothing. He was not classed with the amchasbands or superior genii of nature. Had he, like Atys, Osiris, Adonis, Jesus, and other solar men, a distinct human legend? With regard to Jesus, of course, it is fair to discriminate between the ethical and the cosmological traditions. Poor, good man! he little dreamed, when raised upon his cross, of the gratuitous mockery to which his memory was destined in this fine solar company, theatrically born every 25th of December, killed and resuscitated every Easter week. This role was expedient for the church propaganda in times and countries wedded to the old solar ritual. A gentle fusion thus was effected between the two mythologies, before humanizing them with the personal virtues of Jesus. I translated the legends pertinent to this theme, adding my own comments, in 1853, "Zend-Avesta and Solar Religions." I should like to know who has a copy of this work, which is now out of print, and the plates stolen.

The myth of Mithras would hav the more interest for us, because the Hebrew messianic idea is reputed to hav been borrowed from the Magian while the Jews were Persian subjects. If so, while they were borrowing, why did they not take a wife for messiah? The Zend legend prophesies of that function as connubial, and executed in duet which is more feasible.

The New Deal.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav already presented one ticket for the consideration of your readers for the officers of the National Liberal League. Will you allow me to present another, that, I think, ought to be elected? For president, Ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham; for secretary, Ex-Rev. Samuel P. Putnam; for chairman of committee, Ex-Rev. George Chainey. These three are all working positions, and I know of no three persons that could fill them any better. I believe Mr. Burnham would be acceptable to a large portion of the Liberals. He is very popular in his own state, where he is best known, especially with all Spiritual friends, although not a Spiritualist himself. Then he and Chainey should be kept constantly in the field building up auxiliary societies. Then we might hav as other officers, Courtlandt Palmer for treasurer, and Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, of New York, as chairman of the finance committee. That would place a majority of the board in New York city, with one member in Boston and one in the West, Michigan. They should not all be taken from the two great Eastern cities, and I am sure it would giv much greater satisfaction to hav the president selected from the West. And I know of no one in the West who would giv better satisfaction than would giv better satisfaction than Brother Burnham. I learn from a friend of Mr. Underwood, of the Index, that he would not accept of any office this present year on account of his editorial duties, but that, if a good ticket is elected and such a platform adopted as has been proposed, Mr. Underwood will giv the new movement his hearty support. And I feel sure that he and his friends on that side of the question would be satisfied with Mr. Burnham and the others I hav mentioned.

I notice that Mrs. Dr. Severance is not as yet prepared for reconciliation. I am sorry for that. And my old friend Walker is still on the war-path. But if we hav got fight in us, and it must come out, why not direct it toward the common enemy? We can learn something from the political parties. They are willing to accept all who will aid them. Really the old Comstock issue is dead, and it is now proposed to reorganize on the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Why should anyone object to that?

Freethinkers are rather independent people—so independent that it is difficult to organize them. If they do not agree, they are all sure they are right, and none of them like to get on their knees and ask forgivness for their past course of action. And no one should be required to do so. Let each hold tenaciously to the opinion that they hav been in the right in the past and are so at present. And then, as we hav found solid ground upon which we can all stand, let us cease our bickerings and unite all our forces, and go to work in harmony. For myself, I will not accept any position but that of private in the ranks, and I do not know a man or woman living but I will cordially work with in the attempt to secularize the government.

It has been suggested that the society take a new name, something like "The United States Secularization Society." Possibly it would be best to do so. All these questions will come up at the Congress at Cassadaga, and I hope will receive the intelligent and candid consideration of all present. I was very much pleased with Courtlandt Palmer's article in last week's Man, and hope it may be copied into THE TRUTH SEEKER and other of our Liberal journals. "Let us hav peace," and also renewed resolution to accomplish more than we ever hav in the past.

Truly yours, H. L. GREEN.

Plans for the New York Crematory.

A plot of land has been purchased in Newtown, L. I., by the Uuited States Cremation Company, and ground is to be broken for a crematory in about two months. The secretary of the society, E. A Caswell, said recently: "The directors of the company are to meet once a week until one of the many plans presented by architects is adopted. Then the work will go right on. The building will hav a rich effect without any pretentious ornaments. The chimney will be in the shape of an obelisk. Much delay was caused by listening to the wishes of some of the directors regarding the site of the crematory. These directors thought it ought to be on Manhattan Island, in order that it might be within easy reach of every one in the city. They were anxious, too, for a stylish edifice. In both considerations they were finally overruled for the following reasons:

"The crematory at Newtown will be opposit to the Lutheran cemetery, and on very high ground, overlooking New York city on one side and Sheepshead Bay on the other. It can be easily reached from the Seventh street, the Twenty-third street, and the Ninety-third street ferries. The crematory will be ninety minutes from Madison square. It is about equi-distant from either end of New York city. The price of the land was less than it would be in New York, and hence more money was left for a building.

"The land cost between $2,000 and $3,000. Of the capital stock of $25,000 there has been $14,000 taken. The building we expect will cost from $12,000 to $15,000, and a crematory furnace after the pattern of that at Gotha, Germany, one of the best we know of, and in which hundreds of bodies hav been burnt, will cost $3,000. We hav a complete description of the Gotha crematory, and are going to improve on it, we hope. The general plan for the building will include reception rooms, and a chapel or hall, with a catafalque at the remote end of the room, and a pulpit or reading desk beyond the catafalque and near the wall. Neither the body nor the coffin will be seen after it is placed in the catafalque, unless it is desired by those in charge of the last rites. Of course there will be different arrangments at the funerals, according to the wishes of those interested. Probably the usual way will be to place the body with the coffin and flowers or gifts, if desired, on the catafalque, over which will be a covering or pall, which will hide the coffin from view of the audience. Then the body will be lowered into the furnace, and before the services are over the body will be half consumed. There can be no complaint that it is a nuisance, for the neighborhood of the Lutheran cemetery and the outskirts of Williamsburgh are lugubrious already."

"Won't the chance of quickly and completely getting rid of a victim tend to increase murders by poison?"

"No. Unless a reputable physician givs a death certificate the body will not be received."

"What will be the charge?"

"Not over $25 or $30 for each incineration. The operation will be over in an hour. No flame touches the body. The temperature of the furnace will be 2,000° Fahrenheit. Hot air destroys the body inside of an hour, leaving a residue of pure white ashes weighing about four per cent of the body. These the friends may take away with them. The crematory will be in operation before winter."

Communications.

A Call for the Eighth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League.

All citizens of the United States, whether they hav heretofore acted with this League or not, who believe in a secular government and a secular republic, separation of church and state, the equality of all citizens before the law, without distinction of creed or race or sex; justice for all, and privileges and monopolies for none; the need of universal secular education, free speech, and a free press as the basis of universal suffrage, are invited to appear or to be represented at the Eighth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, to be held at Cassadaga Lake, Chautauqua Co., New York, on Monday and Tuesday, the 8th and 9th of September next (at the close of the New York Freethinkers' Convention at that place).

The League has for its objects the purposes above stated, and has sought to carry them out by securing:

1. The total separation of church and state; this is the first and chief object of the League, and includes among other things the taxation of church property and the suppression of sectarian appropriations; and, as necessary to that general object, the League insists upon,
2. The protection of all citizens in their equal religious, civil, and political rights, without regard to religious belief or want of such belief.
3. The universal, secular, and scientific education of the people, so as to emancipate them from the prevalent superstitions.
4. The impartial, secular administration and enforcement of the laws by secular authorities only, who shall be directly responsible to the people.
5. The inviolability of the mails, and their impartial administration for postal purposes only.
6. Freedom of the press and of speech, without any censorship except responsibility before the jury of the country for any abuse of that freedom.

Year by year we find that the above principles and measures are openly or covertly violated more and more in every state and by the general government, and chiefly through church influences. Any sect, church, or "religion" that militates against these principles openly or covertly, directly or indirectly, is the enemy of American liberty and of the American people. The League is opposed to churches and "religions" only as they are opposed to liberty and to the rights of man, the general education of the people, and the progress of mankind.

All American citizens, therefore, to whom these principles and objects commend themselvs, should rally to their support by a common and permanent organization, which is now the National Liberal League, and should make it the nurse and defender of freedom in every town and state as well as in the nation. In no other way can "the blessings of liberty," the birth-right of American freemen, be effectivly maintained. At this Congress it is designed to revise the basis of the League so as to make it so broad and Liberal that all who sympathize with its general purpose may co-operate with it to the end that a general union of all citizens of Liberal sentiments may result, and that new officers of the League may be selected without regard to past differences.

All Charter and Life Members of the League, and all delegates from local Auxiliary Leagues, will hav votes in the Congress. Each Auxiliary is entitled to send five delegates—its president, secretary, and three other members—to the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats in the Congress, and to votes by the permission of the Congress.

Combine, then, for your common defense, for general secular education, and for the firm support of the essentials of free institutions. Let it not be your fault if, in the growth and prosperity of our people, their liberties and yours are frittered away and lost!

Dated New York, July 12, 1884.

T. B. Wakeman, President N. L. L.
Elizur Wright, 1st Vice-President.
T. C. Leland, Secretary, 744 Broadway, New York.

A Proposit'on from Mr. A. B. Bradford.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I am glad to notice the disposition of our radical brethren to consider the present and the future of the National Liberal League, as an agency for the spread of Freethought. I, too, hav an opinion on the subject, and it is expressed in a series of resolutions which I shall ask the New York State Freethinkers' Association to adopt, during its approaching meeting at Cassadaga. I send them to you for publication in The Truth Seeker, and my object is to lay them before the minds of our brethren in good season, so that when the time comes for discussion and action, we may hav matured thoughts expressed on this practical subject.

I confess to a blush of shame at the smallness of the sum suggested in the resolutions, as the pay of a general agent. The man we need for this responsible and self-denying work must hav a thick skin, and a courage and perseverance which never dream of defeat. In any of the Christian sects he would readily command a salary of five thousand a year. But in the beg nning of a great movement like ours, aiming, as it does, to overthrow the fortress of superstition which it has taken eighteen hundred years to build up, sacrifice must be the order of the day. A reformer, before he strikes a single blow, must lay out his accounts to sacrifice wealth, honor, reputation, position, and all else that men hold dear, on the altar of truth and righteousness. Respectfully, Enon Valley, Pa., July 15, 1884. A. B. Bradford.

THE RESOLUTIONS.

1. Resolved, That in view of the truthful maxim, "In union there is strength," the New York State Freethinkers' Association, assembled in convention at Cassadaga, respectfully suggest to the National Liberal League, which is soon to meet in this place, whether or not it would be good policy to drop the name taken 1876 at its organization, and assume the title of "The American Secular Union," as more expressiv of our principles and purposes, announced to the world in the "Nine Demands of Liberalism."

2. Resolved, That we respectfully recommend that the Radicals of this country, constituting such an organization, should confine their efforts to the one purpose of secularizing the general and state governments, and destroying the present unconstitutional and dangerous power which the church practically exercises in our politics; leaving all other projects of reform, important as they may be, either to the future where they belong, or to other bodies of citizens who may feel a particular interest in them.

3. Resolved, That as a pre-requisit to secularizing the state, the people who compose the state must be enlightened as to the history and claims of the organization known as the Christian church, and the danger to which popular liberty is now, and always has been, exposed by its officious intermeddling and dictation in political affairs. This enlightenment can only be effected by a full, fair, and free discussion, through the press and the platform, of the pretensions of this vast and powerful body, showing the people who hav for ages been misled by its influence that there is no ground whatever, either in history, criticism, or reason, for the claims it makes.

4. Resolved, That if the National League shall take the aforesaid suggestions in the kindly spirit in which they are offered, we would earnestly recommend the executiv authority to employ for one year, as an experiment, a suitable person to act as a general agent, whose duty it shall be to visit societies already formed, to organize new ones, to awaken an interest in the cause by lecturing and by personal visitation, to procure readers of, and subscribers to, our Radical newspapers and other periodicals, and to act in all other ways calculated to promote the cause.

5. Resolved, That if such suitable man can be found in our ranks to render this much needed service, this association pledges itself to raise one-half of a salary of $1,000 to support such an agent in the field; leaving the other half to be raised by the other societies now composing the League; the agent to make quarterly reports to the executiv authority of his progress in the work.

Something About New England Puritanism,

There has been a vast amount of laudatory effusion expended over the superior enterprise, intelligence, and virtue of the New England Puritans. Their zeal for justice, their love of liberty, their desire to promote education and advance civilization, hav been said and sung, and their praises proclaimed both long and loud. The efforts of their worshipers are those of the lawyer, who is bound to win his case, right or wrong. They are not striving to bring out the whole truth and do the subject exact and even justice.

It is true the Puritans possessed an indomitable will, great courage, patience, perseverance, and determination; they had inherited these qualities from the old North Sea robbers, from whom they had remotely descended. They also had a fiery religious zeal that persuaded them to suffer and die for their belief, and to hang the person who doubted it. They educated their children, and with them labor was honorable. But they were bigoted, superstitious, and intolerant, and a person of Liberal ideas could not liv in the colony.

At their first election of officers, held on board the Mayflower before they landed, Nov. 9, 1620, every person was allowed to vote. After eleven years, in 1631, the Puritans having had supreme control, and an opportunity to develop their real inwardness, a law was passed restricting the right to vote and hold office to church-members. Oaths of obedience to magistrates were required; taxes were levied on all to support the Puritan church, and a law also passed to enforce attendance on public worship. Such was the liberty given by unadulterated Puritanism when it had the power. For opposing this policy, Roger Williams was banished in the dead of winter, and for fourteen weeks wandered in the snow through a desolate forest, living on parched corn, roots, and acorns, and sleeping at night in hollow trees.

When a more representativ form of government was attempted to be established in 1634, that leading Puritan clergyman, Cotton, preached a powerful sermon against any change; and he only reflected the policy of the Puritan church. Says the historian, Redpath: "Every shade of popular belief was closely scrutinized; the slightest departure from orthodox doctrins was met with a charge of heresy, and to be a heretic was to be an outcast."

How they loved liberty!

In 1637, "Mrs. Anne Hutchinson and her friends were declared unfit for the society of Christians and banished from the territory of Massachusetts." The crime they were guilty of committing was, insisting on the right to speak in public meetings.

In 1643 the English settlements of Piscataqua, Providence plantation, Plymouth colony, and the Island of Rhode Island, were refused admission into the confederation of New England colonies on account of their entertaining some heretical belief.

In 1656 two Quaker women arrived in Boston, Anne Austin and Mary Fisher. "The two women were caught and searched for marks of witchcraft, their trunks were broken open, their books were burnt by the hangman, and they themselvs thrown into prison. After several weeks' confinement they were banished from the colony. Before the end of the year eight others had been arrested and sent back to England. The Delegates of the Union were immediately convened, and a rigorous law passed that excluded all Quakers from the country. Whipping, the loss of an ear, and banishment were the penalties for the first offense; . . . the other ear cut off for the second, . . . and the tongue bored through with a red-hot iron for the third" (Redpath's History U. S.).

In 1657 Anne Burden was beaten with twenty stripes for preaching against persecution. To enjoy life, to liv in peace with these Puritans, one had to believe precisely as they did, or, if disbelieving, the mouth must be sealed as close as it is in death. No questions or arguments allowed. This secured unanimity and piety, and diffused genuin Puritanism.

In September and October, 1659, four men and one woman were arrested for heresy. The men were immediately hung. The woman, after being led to be executed with a rope around her neck, was reprieved and banished, to be hung if she ever returned. She returned, and was hung. Twenty-seven others were thrown into prison to await trial, when public indignation forced these Christian, liberty-loving Puritans to repeal the outrageous law and let the prisoners go free.

In 1692 witchcraft broke out at Salem, Mass. It had its origin in a person troubled with a nervous disorder. There was a quarrel between two factions in the churcb, and the dominant party utilized this popular superstition to secure their ends. Such was the beginning of Salem witchcraft. But the fostering hand of a bigoted church soon swelled the superstition to fearful proportions. One hundred and fifty were soon thrown into prison. Fifty-five were tortured into telling abominable falsehoods, and twenty were executed. To doubt the reality of witchcraft was considered a heresy worthy of death.

Cotton Mather, the exponent of the Puritan church, the head and representativ of the New England clergy, preached in favor of this persecution and sat at the trials for witchcraft, and decided when there was sufficient proof to condemn. He wrote a treatis on "Witchcraft," "expressing his great thankfulness that so many witches had met their just doom." And this impudent book received the approbation of the president of Harvard College.

The Puritans hav sold the widow's last cow, last hog, and last bed to pay the church tax. They had great reverence for God, and Sunday, and the Bible, but no sympathy for suffering humanity. These are the people who were called "Puritans" because they believed in the right to interpret the Bible for themselvs. This is the way they took to scatter light, and love, and liberty, and intelligence throughout this country.

Is there any class of persons so religiously blind as to believe it is that kind of influence that has shaped our civilization, given us our genius and enterprise, and fixed our national chrracteristics? Ten thousand factors hav been at work to do this, the least of which is genuin New England Puritanism. Until Puritanism became humanized, civilized, liberalized, and modernized, a free thought could not exist, and where there is no free thought there is no progression, and man is a slave.

The Irishman who builds a railroad or canal, the German who drains a wet farm, the farmer who clears off his land or improves his stock, the inventor who brings better machinery to perform our labor, the capitalist who invests his money in useful improvements, and the thousands of others of God's laborers, are all of them important factors in the progress of civilization. But the men who fold their hands and depend on prayers don't push the world along very much.

Genuin Puritanism is dead. The pure article has vanished and gone, but its ghost returns at regular intervals to receive the adoration of its blind worshipers. A little wholesome criticism and a little healthy reference to history occasionally will hav a tendency to make the visits of his ghostship less frequent. Then Fourth of July orators will not slobber all over them with their verdant effusions, and clergymen will not pour forth by the pailful their laudatory eulogies upon the Puritan fathers without any regard to historical facts.

During all this persecution for opinion's sake, this unreasonable and unrighteous dictation of what a person must believe to enjoy life and peace among these bigoted, dogmatic, and intolerant Puritans, there was an element constantly striving for more religious liberty, more freedom of conscience, more political rights and privileges. After a length of time this spirit of toleration and liberal ideas permeated the whole of New England. As they came in contact with the rest of the world their sectarian bigotry disappeared and they became a very different people. Don't let this important point be forgot. The world has changed them more than they hav the world, and the genius and spirit of American institutions was developed more in spite of than on account of the genuin Puritan element. S. H. EWELL.

Tariff.

I do not often dabble in politics, but when I see such glaring advantages taken of statistics as are shown by the article of Mr. Oldakes in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 21st, and the unfair comparisons of high and low tariff, I cannot refrain from a word of caution in that direction.

He notices the low tariff from 1855 to 1861, and compares the prices of wheat with what he calls the prices of the same from 1874 to 1880, in order to show the injustice of high tariff as discriminating against the farmers of the country. But why does he gentleman omit the high or highest tariffs from 1861 to 1874 in his showing? Simply because during these years the highest prices obtained for wheat, and would hav defeated his pet scheme. It would show that extraordinary prices were had for wheat; that in 1866 to 1868 flour went from nine to sixteen doldollars per barrel and retailed something higher in many parts of the country; that the general wheat crops and trade has never been better; and if high tariff or any tariff causes the activity or depression, why not giv high tariff the advantage of a fair showing?

We had a money crisis in 1857 which had much to do with the price of wheat. The Morrill Tariff bill of 1861 and 1862, which was in force during the war, and was in some respects a prohibition, made a better condition for the farmers, as well as all other classes of labor, than any state of things we hav had in this country either before or since, so far as the enhancement of values of all kinds was concerned. We could afford then to pay internal revenue on manufactures, and thus support the government, in addition to getting higher prices for labor of all kinds, and including wheat.

His argument is that the farmers of the West want a low tariff, so as to enable them to procure farming implements, etc., in a cheap market. The fallacy of this will be seen at a glance when we consider that comparativly few farming implements of any kind are imported. In fact, we hav no competition with any foreign nation in farming implements. We make the best, and stock the whole West at prices lower at any time than the same can be had anywhere in the wide world. The idea of a tariff of from twenty to ninety per cent on these tools is a freak of the imagination, and cannot be found on our custom house books.

A good deal is being said about building up monopolies at home by creating flourishing times by means of a high tariff. When men talk thus, they concede the whole argument in the case. To admit that a high tariff will build up anybody in America is to admit what is claimed for it. The misfortune of creating riches for a few may be a thing to be remedied, but it is an undoubted argument in favor of the doctrin that a tariff will promote industry here. And, bad as it may be, it can be no worse than favoring the outside world and thereby creating monopolies and riches abroad. If industry creates riches for the few, and only a comfortable living for the many, it is certainly much better for us that those riches should be made in America than in Europe, for by the incidents of change and death those riches in some way will, by our institutions, find in time a sure distribution.

Another argument in favor of a somewhat high tariff is that it is the most general assessment upon all classes of people for the support of the government, much more equitable than could be devised by any possible system of internal revenues, and has the merit of creating industry at the same time, while it affords opportunities for emigration to America, and an increase of population. The emigration, enormous as it is, we can stand, at least for a while, but to import laborers by the millions every year, and at the same time open our ports to the manufactures of the world, and thus in addition supply ourselvs with labor already done, is a policy so manifestly ruinous that I wonder how any man of sound political judgment can advocate it.

We hear much complaint in reference to the Western farmer, which to a certain extent is a truth, and this, too, like the incidental fact of building up monopolies, is to be deplored, but, as I hav shown, a low tariff will not help his case. If people will pioneer too rapidly, and push out into territory much in advance of established markets, they must suffer from poor markets and speculators, simply from the fact that other industries hav not yet overtaken them. But to shut down our workshops, and import their products, would only enhance the difficulty, by crowding into the farming districts the multitudes thrown out of employ, and thus make still more farmers, and poorer markets. To make this country a success, and to benefit the farmer most, is to protect American products, and push home manufactures close upon the heels of the agriculturist. The experience to this time has been that the best tariff for protection has afforded the most revenue, and enabled the government to pay its debts, with a flourishing country and plenty of money in the treasury, which cannot be done by any low tariff system.

It is a most singular fact that the question of manufactures was the foundation cause of our nationality. Lord Pitt declared in Parliament that the "American colonies should not be allowed to manufacture a hob nail," which policy at last culminated in our making a tremendous tea party in Boston harbor. What the English government failed to do for the colonies she has been continually since then attempting to accomplish by free trade, and has employed various secret societies with piles of British gold to bring it about. We hav lots of influential newspapers to-day advocating free trade, which are paid by English manufacturers; and the late Cobden Club society is a sample of what can be done in the way of social influence to gain a political point.

Any person who has been observant as to the effects of high and low tariff upon the whole country since the compromise of 1833, ought to be able to settle that policy very easily. From 1833 to 1842 we had the most wretched times that America ever saw; and the "hard times," as they were called, reached their worst in 1843, when our industries were completely prostrated, and the markets so glutted with foreign manufactures that it required several years to consume them after the tariff of 1842 went into operation. The government was so kind to the free trade policy that, at the request of English manufacturers, it built bonded warehouses in Boston and New York to store up their goods, and even favored them so far as to hold millions of dollars' worth of goods almost free from storage, permitting the low duties to be paid on removal. It was the most shameful policy that ever was practiced upon a struggling people; but it raised the importance of tariff and protection to such a white heat that, in 1840, the free trade party was overthrown and a new policy of protection substituted. When a petition twenty miles in length was presented to John Tyler, the acting president, praying for a tariff for protection, and by which means the tariff of 1842 went into effect, he declared that it came to him as a "voice from the people." The Democratic party succeeded in partly defeating the policy by declaring James K. Polk to be a better tariff man than Henry Clay, and George M. Dallas gave the casting vote in favor of the tariff of 1846, after secretary Robert J. Walker had laid a draft of that tariff before the British House before it was submitted to our Congress; which acts of political treachery then condemned the party, from which it can never recover under a free trade policy, and a large portion of its rank and file to-day are fair on the tariff question.

Our nation has always been prostrated under a low tariff, and prosperous under a reasonably high one; and while I should not advocate prohibitory duties, I cannot from my observations these fifty years, and a contrast of the two policies, help but see the vast advantages to be derived from a sound policy of protection for American industries; and to prevent monopolies my method would be, that any corporation, after paying definit expenses, should be compelled to pay dividends to the general government; and for charter privileges, and to obviate excessiv individual gains, I should favor an additional wealth tax to be paid on all excesses over and above certain accumulations, and I should make the tax higher in the ratio of accumulations. This would hav the effect to induce certain successful moneymakers to divide and distribute amongst their relativs and friends, and thus to avoid the excessiv tax levies. It would be doing a vast good by an early distribution of their excessiv wealth. What I would do to wealth I should do to that article in all its shapes—money, lands, and goods of every kind. To make lands or money as free as air and water, as many (would-be reformers) talk of, is an impracticable scheme; or to expect any government to take into its management all the railroads and commercial enterprises of a nation is too absurd to think of. If it cannot find time and legal force enough to punish a few Star Route thieves, what would it do with plunderings of the whole nation of "speculativ droppers," who by hook or crook would manage to get at the head and management of these enterprises? It would render the government a thing to be abused and plundered, and in time create a whole nation of outlaws, cutthroats, and villains.

J. R. PERRY.

A Short Method with Mr. James Hale's God.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: We are under no necessity of drinking a barrel of vinegar in order to ascertain whether or no it is sweet wine! And it seems not to hav been apparent to Mr. Hale, that if, indeed, there were any such a personal omniscience as he supposes, he would be under no necessity of filling four or five of the broad columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER to prove it! Surely it is enough for the priests, and those victimized by that old barbarian book, to boast of an omniscient God, that has "created" a racé of thoughtful minds, that hav no mental capacity for knowing him! Manifestly there are only two methods for dealing with this "God" idea. One is, the long method, "by faith," the Bible idea, "by faith" (Heb. xi, 1-6). And by this method you may hav one "God" or a million, or three gods like the Christians. The other method is the scientific; this is a short one, and in time it will supersede that method of "faith" recommended in that old barbarian book. And what is the verdict of science? It is that, in the whole of things, in all worlds, all phenomena, there is but one substance, and its affection or quality—force. There is but one force, and one matter, uncreated, but without beginning or end; never more nor less in the whole of things. One force, self-controling and progressiv, evolves all the phenomena, in all worlds and all minds. All result from nature's order and laws. Humanity itself is the resulting phenomenon evolved by these forms of force and laws. Now, in Mr. Hale's long argument, he has pointed out no place, no hole, for his "God" to come in; nothing for his "God" to do. There is nothing outside of nature.

The Petition.

From the Index.

Progress has been made in the work of obtaining signatures to the petition for state secularization. But, as it was only started near the close of this session of Congress, it appears advisable to keep it before the public until the next session. Events which hav occurred since the petition was put into circulation demonstrate more clearly than ever the necessity of action on the part of Liberals. The Republican party has just pledged itself to the "separation of the political and ecclesiastical powers" in the territory of Utah, "by the aid of the military, if need be."

"Be we men, and suffer such dishonor?"

What is good for Utah is good for Massachusetts and the District of Columbia, and any place where float the Stars and Stripes. It was proposed in the United States Senate, the other day, to appoint a superintendent of the schools of Utah, in order to prevent the teaching of the Mormon religion in those schools; and this clause of the bill was only withdrawn at the last hour, or minute rather, when it was conclusivly proven to that "honorable" body that no church books of any description were ever heard of in these schools. But what greater right, I ask, has the Bible than the Book of Mormon in the public school, even though it were not true, as it is, that the latter condemns polygamy, while the former sanctions and upholds it? Nay, would the teaching of polygamy in our schools be any greater crime than prayer, trinity, and blood atonement?

Here, Liberals, is your opportunity. Let us take the Republican party and the Senate of the United States at their word, and insist that "the political and ecclesiastical powers" shall be separated through the domain of this republic, and in the doing of this that no favor shall be shown to any religion, be it Mormon, Christian, or Pagan. T. W. CURTIS.

Hearty Indorsement.

From the Investigator.

Mr. Samuel P. Putnam has an able article in the last New York TRUTH SEEKER recommending Mr. George Chainey for the office of next president of the National Liberal League. Mr. Chainey is well qualified in every respect to discharge the duties of that office in a satisfactory manner, and the welfare of the League will no doubt be promoted under his administration. If Mr. Wakeman, the present effectiv presiding officer, should resign, we would like to see Mr. Chainey occupy his place.

Representativ Men.

In our own opinion, Mr. Underwood and Mr. Wakeman are the most representativ Liberals in America.—Radical Review.

How about Col. Ingersoll?

A CONGREGATION of Middlesex was dreadfully shocked on a recent Sunday at seeing the oldest deacon, who had been sitting in the clover-patch in front of the church, begin to throw back somersaults and go through a most violent series of gymnastics. The sympathy was general when it was known that the first bumblebee of the season had mistaken the leg of the good man's trowsers for its nest.

☞WE wish that our subscribers who are in arrears would make a special effort to pay up. During the summer months our book sales are small, and we hav to depend upon the subscriptions coming in to pay expenses, which are just as heavy now as ever. We know that business generally is dull, that "times are hard," but the amounts are so small individually that it would seem no one can be inconvenienced by paying his dues, while in the aggregate they foot up large, and mean everything to us. It is unpleasant to us to dun our friends, and money is never asked for till imperativly needed; now we must hav it to pay bills with. A good many hundreds of dollars are due on subscriptions, so we are not asking a favor, but simple justice and square dealing between friends.

Mr. Bradford's Propositions.

On another page we print a letter from the veteran Liberal, A. B. Bradford, which embodies three direct changes in the policy of the League. These are:

1. A change of name.

2. The return to first principles in the scope of the work undertaken.

3. The pledging by the New York State Freethinkers' Association of $500 towards paying the salary of an agent to work in the field.

1. The first of these, it seems to us, is unnecessary. Had the name "American Secular Union" been adopted at the outset, it would hav been an admirable one, as in itself it determins the nature of the organization. But to change now would look like backing down. We agree with Messrs Putnam and Chainey in "no compromise." The mistakes of the League need not be looked upon as time entirely wasted, but as a gathering of experience necessary to its growth, and valuable as a guide. What the League's Christian enemies may say of it we do not care. And if its present opponents within the Liberal ranks will not rally round the standard when its course shall be clearly defined, and includes only those objects upon which all Liberals must, in the very nature of things, agree to, then it will be plain that they care more for their own triumph than for the cause they profess to love.

2. We were the first to ask for the return to first principles, or, in other words, to confine the attempts of the League to Freethought work. By doing so we believe that the state laws now discriminating against Freethinkers in the matters of oaths, enforced support of churches (indirect but no less enforced), and other legally collected contributions to Christianity, can be repealed. But it is only by united effort that this can be done, which united effort cannot be had on a platform embracing all the "reform" issues of the day. Therefore, the second of Mr. Bradford's propositions has our cordial indorsement.

3. The third suggestion is also a good one. We hope the State Association will adopt it. The League should, in our opinion, authorize the president and secretary, provided they enter the field and remain continuously employed, to raise and retain $1,200 each for their services, which, with the privilege of lecturing, will enable them to support themselvs and families, and pay their traveling expenses. They should also be authorized to print and distribute tracts, to go before legislativ committees, to employ legal counsel when necessary, and to take all needed steps to counteract and render harmless the influence of the churches on our government.

We understand that Messrs. Chainey and Putnam are willing to enter upon the work on conditions similar to these, trusting to their own exertions to raise the money. Let us accept the sacrifice, arm and equip them, and send them forth.

Early Religious Liberty in Massachusetts.

It will be remembered that in a recent number of the North American Review, copied by us at the time, Philip Schaff, an eminent Christian scholar, made the statement that:

"There was a time when dissenters were fined, imprisoned, exiled, and even hanged, for religious opinions, to the extent of the power of the civil authority of our free country, even in the enlightened state of Massachusetts, and such persecution was justified on the basis of the union of church and state."

Dr. John Hall, in the Tribune, now says this is not so. He makes the bold assertion that:

"The simple historical truth in the premises is that no person was ever hanged or otherwise executed or punished in Massachusetts for religious opinions."

The banishment of Roger Williams and the executions of Quakers in Boston, Mr. Hall contends, were for political and not religious reasons, and he cites Bancroft and other authorities in proof.

It can, however, easily be shown that Dr. John G. Hall is mistaken. In his zeal to defend Calvinism he forgets many things that convict him of partisan untruth, only one of which we will mention now, as but a few months ago a full statement of the doings of the early Christians was made in these columns.

In 1833 Abner Kneeland was arrested, indicted, and tried for blasphemy for saying that he "did not believe in the God which the Universalists did." The verdict of guilty was affirmed in the Court of Appeals, and in 1836 Mr. Kneeland was sentenced to two months' imprisonment, which sentence was executed.

This is an incontestable fact, the witnesses to it are living, the court records show it, and even Dr. John G. Hall's brazenness will be found insufficient to cover the spot of blood on Massachusetts' fame. Other cases of persecution for religious opinions are almost as easily shown, but this is enough to convict the preacher of falsehood.

French Freemasonry.

According to the London Freemason, that order in France is filled through and through with Atheism. At present, it says, French Freemasonry stands before the world utterly ignoring the name of God, and welcoming within its pale not only Voltairean Deists, but those "who say in their hearts, There is no God." It is also stated that religious Freemasons are getting discouraged at seeing "the skeptic, the Positivist, the open unbeliever, brought to the fore."

This state of things grieves the good Freemason, which declares "God" to be the Great Architeknos of the order, and a doubt of his existence a heinous crime, of which it can hav no tolerance. Until, therefore, the bad French Masons believe in "God"—or say they do, if they don't—the pious-minded are advised to hav no intercourse or fellowship with them.

Did it never occur to the editor of the Freemason that the French brethren hav as good a right to rule themselvs, and believe as they please, as the English lodges? Such a thought would console him, and relieve him of the necessity of expressing intolerant ideas, which may sometime come back to plague the author. It is the opinion of an eminent Italian gentleman, now living in Rome, that there are a great many heterodox Masons scattered throughout the world. The Freemason may yet find itself lonesome in its piety.

IN the course of his mental evolution, Mr. H. W. Beecher has every now and then driven a peg to mark where he had got to. The row of pegs is now quite formidable to the onlooking Christian. They are arranged about as follows:

1. Rejected the Creation story.
2. " " Fall "
3. " " Hell "
4. " " Atonement "

Sunday he stuck another, which is:

5. Rejection of the Resurection story.

In the course of the remarks made while driving this peg Mr. Beecher turned off some sensible paragraphs, and some that the unconverted will find confusing. A couple only are worth quoting: 1. "I am not one who believes in the resurection of the literal body, nor that literally my bones shall be covered again with my identical flesh, and blood flow in these veins and arteries; nevertheless I will never drop the language of the days when people did believe it. 2. The resurrection of the body is not to be accepted as a scientific fact. Innumerable troubles beset the steps of those who, instructed now in science, yet find it hard to tear themselvs away from old teachings that this very body is to rise again. But we are to hold to it by imagination. I am not to believe in it by my intellect; but I will believe it by my imagination."

IN a report deploring the frequency of divorce, adopted at the last conference of the Methodist church, occurs this passage: "Unchastity is a nest wherein are bred sin and crime, while an unchaste people are a pest in a political body." If the conference had not adjourned we would respectfully represent to the august body that a closer tethering of Methodist ministers would in a great measure remove the cause of many divorces. Statistics prove that the ordained followers of John Wesley are just the "pest in a political body" that the report complains of.

JAMES G. BLAINE, in his letter of acceptance, says not a word about the separation of church and state, though he devotes considerable space to the Mormon question, which is a matter of far less interest and importance. His remark near the close of his letter, that "it is a good land which the Lord our God doth giv us," is peculiar. It is a tradition handed down to this generation by good authority that the men who fought and died in the Revolutionary war were in a measure instrumental in giving us the country we inhabit.

PRESIDENT VIELE takes the right course in ignoring the petition of the Sabbatarians in regard to the music in Central Park on Sunday. The concerts were furnished in response to a popular demand, and no person of sense will say that music is any more sinful in the Park than in a church, or on Sunday than any other day. These Sabbatarians are what Mr. Dana might well characterize as hebetudinous.

At Rest.

At her home in St. Cloud, N. J., on Sunday, July 13th, after suffering for several years with consumption, Jennie Macdonald, wife of E. M. Macdonald, passed to her rest. She died in the belief which for many years she had held in common with her husband, finding consolation in the love and kindness of her family and friends, welcoming death as a surcease of the suffering which no skill could allay, and dreading it only as it separated her from the bright world and those she held most dear.

Funeral services were held on the 15th at the house of Mr. Andrews. The room was filled with those whom death had made mourning friends. At the head of the casket a table stood laden with floral offerings. Mr. George Chainey delivered the funeral discourse. He spoke as follows:

DEAR FRIENDS: In such an hour as this I always feel that silence is more eloquent than speech. If I could utter the grandest words of all the orators, the wisest words of all the philosophers, and the sweetest words of all the poets, your hearts crushed with grief would say with the sorrow-stricken Hamlet, "Words, words, words." We are here to comfort, as best we can, dear friends out of whose sight has gone in this young life so much of the light and beauty of their lives. But our silent presence speaks louder than anything I can say. Real love is seen and felt best in the warm clasp of the hand —the eyes that are soft and tremulous with its light, and in loving, thoughtful deeds. In the chamber of death and grief we are brought to feel, more closely than at any other time or place, our common human relationship. One touch of nature makes the whole world kin; sooner or later all must mourn. Death and woe are our common heritage. The sunniest life is sometimes flecked with shadow. Friend after friend departs—who has not lost a friend? It is only through the memory of our own heart's sorrows that we can enter into the feelings of our friends to-day. Fortunately for our poor hearts, after the darkest night of grief comes the morn of some new day of joy. The flowers of hope, crushed to earth beneath the pitiless storm of grief, rise refreshed beneath the smiles of the warm sun of human love and sympathy. Time, also, is a great restorer. Companionship with nature in her kindlier moods medicins our grief and proves to be like the innocent sleep—balm for hurt minds. The divine bard, Shakspere, in the first act of Hamlet, disperses all the gloom of night and death when he says:

"But look! the morn, in russet mantle clad,
Walks o'er the dew of yon high eastern hill."

Our grieved hearts would seek to hide themselvs in dark and gloomy places, and to find comfort in sad and mournful rites. In this we are unwise. Life brings enough sorrow at its best, without aiding it by putting on mourning, or shutting out of our lives the all-healing sunlight. Fortunately, we are learn- of nature to comfort ourselvs with the soothing influences of flowers and music instead of adding to the sadness of death with the dark and gloomy superstitions of the past that hav so often made a mockery of grief and an auction of consolation.

It was not my privilege to know intimately the dear one whose loss we mourn. I remember her bright and winning face and her sweet voice when she sang for us in some of our Liberal meetings. In the early summer of the season and of life, that sweet voice has been hushed in death, and the home of our brave young editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER been deprived of her beautiful presence. How gladly the great army of readers of this paper would comfort and cheer him in this hour of sorrow if they could! We and they all hav learned to love him for his good work as the successor of the martyred Bennett. His position has been a difficult one. The influence of Mr. Bennett having been so largely a personal one, many predicted that the paper must die with its founder. But not only has he kept the grand old TRUTH SEEKER up to the point of interest at which he received it, but carried it so far beyond that even his enemies hav confessed that the paper is improved. But could the readers hav seen how this labor was being performed while every day he saw the light of his home fading out, and the hours he should hav spent in rest passed in the sick chamber of his wife, I am sure they would hav felt the warmest love for him as a man as well as admiration for him as an editor. As he has ministered to their enjoyment, so now, I trust, they will minister to his comfort by doing all they can to support him in his great work. As one of these readers, I would say to our editor, Accept the earnest sympathy and most heartfelt compassion of our hearts. I am sure that in this I shall echo the sincere feeling of all the thousands of your friends and patrons.

As Freethinkers we hav no comfort to offer at the grave better than the fellowship of human love. I am not a priest. In the presence of death my eyes are as blind as yours. For long I strove to look beyond the hights—but death to me is still the strange country from whose bourne no traveler returns. I know that as long as love and death endure many will imagin that they see the glint of stars shining on a fairer land, and hear the hushed footsteps of unseen travelers from that far distant bourne.

But the longer I liv the more I am convinced that even if this hope is ever to be realized, and we are in some sweet Elysian fields to liv again with our loved and lost, our joy will there and then be the sweeter by every moment we hav forgotten it in our desire to make this world a little more of a paradise. Let us then daily toil and strive to make some one else happy, to plant a few flowers in some waste corner of the earth, and then though death for us be the dreamless sleep of eternal rest, the race livs on, growing grander and nobler every day. So shall we join that choir invisible, whose music is the gladness of the world. So shall we ever help on the right side in that great conflict that is constantly widening the skirts of light, and making the struggle with darkness narrower. To reappear again only in the grass or flowers, or to be a part of the unconscious dust of the most common highway, along which living feet run on errands of mercy and justice, were a million times better than the immortality offered us either in heaven or hell by the orthodox religion. But, friends, no matter what I say, death cannot appear other than death. Here it is waiting for each of us as the last price we must pay for the boon of life.

Some would teach us that we must prepare to die. But our business is to liv—to liv. Life is health, strength. Let us seek for it by taking care of our bodies. Life is thought, reason, knowledge. Let no day pass that does not enrich our minds with some ray of wisdom. Life is love. Let us win love by making ourselves lovable. Then when death comes we can say: I hav proved what life can giv. I hav had joy and sorrow. I hav experienced all the pleasures of the senses. I hav known the joys of thought, and above all I hav loved and been loved. So that now, O death, whether thou art night or day—the folding or unfolding of wings—eternal rest or eternal felicity, I giv thee welcome and sink into thy mysterious arms without fear and without regret.

The burial took place at Woodlawn Cemetery, a few miles north of New York. When the coffin had been lowered, Mr. S. P. Putnam stepped forth from among the friends who had gathered at the grave, and said:

The fewer words we utter at a time like this the better, for words can but feebly express the thoughts and feelings that possess us when thus overshadowed by the awful beauty of death. Sure I am that we are made richer by this hour's experience, for we realize more deeply and tenderly than ever the bonds of human friendship. As we go forth from this sacred spot into the great battle of life, our heart and hope blend together in the ineffable memory of this dear friend who is now invisible.

We cannot solve the mystery of life. It has unknown deeps. Neither can we solve the mystery of death. There is no revelation. Each heart must find its own hope and comfort. But just as spring follows winter, even so from our darkest sorrows comes a light to make new joy for our way. In the shadow of death we see the stars of eternity.

This young life has not perished. It has been and it yet will be a stream of beauty, though it flows on unseen. Because she has lived and loved we are better and stronger, and the world of our affections is enriched. Therefore to this dear friend we say, Farewell! we leave thy body to the dust—but thy bright face lingers in memory still. We cannot forget thee. Thou art an impulse to our onward life. We know not what thy fate may be—but it must be beautiful, even like the flowers which spring from the dark bosom of earth. Over thee we strew the flowers, symbol of the thoughts within us of the dead which can never die. Sweets to the sweet. And from thy fair and unpolluted flesh may violets spring.

As Mr. Putnam spoke the words, "sweets to the sweet," each friend came forward and dropped upon the coffin a bouquet of flowers. Nothing could be more appropriate or more touching in its effect.

So passes from life to death another from out our little group. The shadow has fallen, and in its darkness disappears the wife, the mother, the friend, the singer of sweet songs. As a wife, none was ever more true, as a mother more indulgent, as a friend more steadfast; and as a singer it seemed to us that none could so disclose the melody of the human voice. She sang at Chickering Hall when thousands gathered to welcome home the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER; at Watkins when the Freethinkers went there to their annual meeting; at all our League meetings here; and at home she filled her house with music like the warbling of a bird. She was nearly persuaded to accept a belief in a future life. Some eighteen months ago, when her baby died, she wondered if it was to liv again. And Mr. Bennett, who had but a short time been dead, would he not find her little babe and care for it there as she knew he would in this life if it had no other friend? But when death came, if beyond the sea of time the dying eyes beheld a farther shore, she gave no sign. With almost latest breath she spoke good-bye to husband and mother, and so speaking sank into unconsciousness and died.

Words are many—they cannot picture grief; friends are strong and kind—they cannot bring back the dead; resignation to what is inevitable—that may at least, we hope, teach us to suffer and be strong.

Dr. Westbrook Demurs.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your notice of "Man—Whence and Whither?" in your last issue, is calculated to mislead your readers. You say, "Mr. Westbrook is not a Christian, neither is he a Freethinker."

If by Christianity you mean the system of theology held by Romanists and Orthodox Protestants, I am not a Christian. But if by Christianity is meant that principle of natural religion which Augustine said "has always existed among the ancients and was not absent from the beginning of the human race," and of which Professor Tyndall says, "The facts of religious feeling are to me as certain as the facts of physics," and of which Renan says: "But nothing is more remote from the truth than the dream of those who seek to imagin a perfected humanity without religion." . . . "Devotion is as natural as egoism to a true-born man"—then I am a Christian.

If by "Freethinker," you mean an Atheist, I am not a Freethinker, and in this I am backed by Darwin and the most advanced scholarship of the world. But if by "Freethinker" you mean one who believes in the exercise and publication of Free-thought, then, as I plainly proclaimed myself in the Investigator of April 30th, I am a "Freethinker of the Freethinkers." It is about time we understood whether Freethinkers must subscribe to a fixed, narrow creed, a shibboleth of negations, or whether they are to be left to the exercise of Freethought and free-speech, without being held up to contempt as "religious guerrillas," as you are pleased to class me. I am sorry to find among a few so-called Liberals as much of the spirit of intolerance and bigotry as among the orthodox sects themselvs. You say I "reject evolution." This is as big a "mistake" as "Moses" ever made, and rivals Joseph Cook in his genius for misrepresentation! I say distinctly on page 80, "The general law of evolution is as real as the law of gravitation." And on page 82, I say, "Evolution is an acknowledged fact among well educated men." The most charitable conclusion is that the writer of the "notice" of my book had overlooked chapter iii.

I thank you, Mr. Editor, for speaking so flatteringly of me as a "courteous scholarly gentleman," and I always hope to merit such compliments. I really had imagined that I was already in the ranks of Freethought. But it seems a "gain of such magnitude" has not yet been realized. Perhaps I shall take a step in advance when you point out the "fallacies, wrong statements, illogical reasoning, and absurd dogmatism," of which you say my book is full. I am a truth-seeker and hav much to learn and hav often been obliged to revise my opinions; but I feel sure that I shall never admit that Free-thought means conformity to the conclusions of others.

You are certainly very kind, Mr. Editor, to keep my book on sale "to accommodate your Theistic friends." It might be impertinent to inquire how many books you would hav left upon your shelves if you should establish a Liberal (?) index exgurgatorius and exclude all Theistic and Spiritualistic publications!

R. B. WESTBROOK.

1707 Oxford street, Philadelphia, June 14, 1884.

Our objections to Mr. Westbrook's book can be shortly summarized. As stated they were:

1. A rejection of evolution.

2. That his book is full of fallacies, wrong statements, illogical reasoning, and absurd dogmatism.

But first let us say that Mr. Westbrook is too familiar with dictionaries and accepted etymological authorities to need enlightenment on the meaning of "Christian." To be a Christian one must believe the creation story and the fall, because on them hang heaven and hell, and several other everlasting things. Mr. Westbrook now proclaims himself an evolutionist, consequently he is not a Christian. This is easily shown. But that he is not a Liberal is not so easily shown. On all secular matters probably Mr. Westbrook would work with us; but "Liberal" in this country has grown to mean those who pitch overboard in its entirety the Christian mythology. Mr. Westbrook keeps hold of the central myth, and in that sense he is not a Liberal. It may be a careless use of the word, and reprehensible; if so, he will pray forgiv us.

The statement that he rejects evolution might hav been clearer had it been written that he rejects the results of evolution. It is true that he formally, and by word of mouth, accepts evolution, but his evolution is "merely the uniform processes in which every product has an antecedent, every effect a cause" (p. 59), and not that science which, beginning with protoplasm, shows the orderly succession of life till man, the highest and best, is reached. Evolution from him receives only lip acceptance, of little value in the face of sentences like these: "It [natural selection] has no doubt contributed to his improvement and elevation, but it is impossible to conceive how it could hav developed man from a clot of jelly reposing in the depths of the ocean." "The fact is that all impartial and profound thinkers cannot but feel at times that natural selection . . . is wholly inadequate to account for the stupendous results which everywhere exist in the world." It is easy enough to sneer at "clots of jelly," but it will be somewhat difficult to convince the reading public that the writer of the foregoing lines is an ardent supporter of Darwin and Haeckel.

One of Mr. Westbrook's wrong statements is this:

"We try to grasp the idea of the eternity of matter, and find it impossible. It certainly cannot be demonstrated, and therefore it is nothing but a subterfuge for ignorance—a guess."

A man who could deliberately write that can hav little respect for reason, or must be blind to the conclusions drawn from unquestionable premises. As was pointed out in the comments on Mr. Hale, it has become an axiom that "out of nothing nothing can come." Even if Mr. Westbrook's God formed the universe, he must hav had something out of which to whittle it. Matter exists, and is neither creatable nor destructible. The only avoidance of the idea of eternity for it is to demonstrate that it does not exist, or that it is capable of perfect annihilation, or that it can be created at pleasure. Perhaps Mr. Westbrook will favor the world by making just a little new matter.

An "absurd dogmatism" of the gentleman's is found on page 102 of his book:

"But we are pressed with the common queries, Where did God originate? Who made him? We cannot answer these questions, but it does not follow that he does not exist. There are many things we cannot account for, the reality of which we never question. If we could answer all possible questions about God, he would not be God. If Laplace had found God in scanning the heavens with his telescope, or if Lawrence had found him with his scalpel, he would not hav been the infinit intelligence and power. Such a God as cultured reason discovers in the scientific method cannot be seen with either telescope or microscope. The finite cannot comprehend the Infinit; the lesser cannot contain the greater. The child cannot tell where his father came from, but he nevertheless had a father."

According to this reasoning the strongest proof of God's existence is the very fact that we cannot find him. For if he is found, that isn't "him," but some ignis-fatuus that vanishes when touched. After reasoning thus, to remark that God exists for all that, is dogmatism—if not absurd, certainly gratuitous. Mr. Westbrook acknowledges that the Theistic postulate is an assumption, and the assumption is God. A trained scholar of Mr. Westbrook's ability ought to know that constructing a theory and then trying to find facts to sustain it, is not the scientific method. The evolutionists first found their facts, and on them based their theory. The two methods constitute the difference between deductiv and inductiv reasoning. Mr. Westbrook need not be told which is scientific and which metaphysical, which stands and which falls. The mistake of the book is found here. The author has used as evidence that which he sets out to prove. The strength of such a procedure is not great enough to need elaborate confutation.

Our friend's remarks about an index expurgatorius were probably written in a heated moment, and call for no special comment. Our book-trade is conducted on the principle that governs the course of the paper—to do good. We never "write up" a book just to sell it.

A GOOD way to promote the cause of Freethought is to get trial subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. To such the paper will be sent three months for fifty cents.

THE NUMERICAL EQUALITY OF THE SEXES.

ADAIR CREEK, E. TENN., July 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The question of polygamy is being discussed in your paper, and I notice that Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., takes objection to monogamy being called natural, and polygamy condemned as a violation of the law of nature as taught by the numerical equality of the sexes. I would call the attention of the persons interested in this discussion to a fact that bears upon the question and that I hav never seen mentioned yet.

While it is probably true that there is an equal number of men and women, yet, as for some reason women marry earlier than men, it is equivalent to an excess in the number of women as far as marriage is concerned. Let us suppose, for argument's sake, that women marry at twenty and men at twenty-five years of age, and that both average to liv till they are fifty years old. Then a woman would hav thirty years of married life and man only twenty-five. Thus if five men of twenty-five were to marry five women of twenty, at the death of the five men their widows would hav each five years to liv that they could spend in the married state, or twenty-five years between them all, so that five men could each hav two wives for five years, or one man six wives for five years, or one man two wives twenty-five years, and yet defraud no men from their chances of marriage.

This fact, that women marry earlier than men, accounts for the large number of widows and old maids; and also for the number of persons that liv in irregular sexual relations, and of itself overthrows the arguments in favor of monogamy as based upon the numerical equality of the sexes.

I am, myself, no friend of polygamy, for I consider it an infringement upon the equal rights of the sexes; but I believe that all those who desire it should hav the right to practice it, and I hav no doubt that it would be found much better adapted to a certain stage of civilization than monogamy; but I am far from believing that monogamy is a natural state; on the contrary, I believe that, as it is understood now, it is entirely artificial, founded upon the needs of private property, and has to be enforced by law and public opinion.

What would be the truly natural relation of the sexes, no one can tell, for time alone will evolve it when the question will hav been taken out of the control of religion, authoritativ morality, public opinion, and when production will hav become so abundant, and so evenly distributed, as to leave all persons free to follow their inclinations without the thousand and one restraints by which our lives are now regulated.

ALBERT CHAVANNES.

FRIENDSHIP, N. Y., July 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: For nearly three years my pen has been mostly silent—impaired health; hence no brain force. But the tocsin notes from the watchtower of Hon. A. B. Bradford, the trumpet call of S. P. Putnam, and the rallying words of H. L. Green, Esq., infuse and enthrill my soul, and should speak to the heart and conscience of every true Liberal. To the rescue, to action! is blown on every breeze. Truly the times are propitious. Yet how many sit supinely content with personal ease? And those, too, calling themselvs Liberals, arrogant that they are not orthodox. Does not the history of the late past—our leaders immured in felon's cells, the encroachments of the church, the vigilance of the God-in-the-Constitution movement—challenge to action, to watchfulness, to vigilance? Not words alone, but actions, deeds, are needed. Wise, able leaders, counsellors; able, fearless presses—these should and must be appointed, established, and sustained. The National Liberal League must be made a success—a triumph. Let one and all resolve to attend the Cassadaga Freethought Convention and the conjoint League Convention. Numbers giv encouragement and influence. Only let the Liberals and those only yet half evoluted come within the influence of these earnest, devoted leaders who will then champion the cause from the rostrum, and selfishness and supine inaction and indifference will be shamed and retired. Then the hoarded dollars will flow into the channel that is to giv life, new impetus, the real sinews to this movement which is struggling to lift humanity from superstition's chains, fetters, and darkness, into light—the glorious light of love and freedom. Although Liberalism has made vast strides, yet the coils of superstition, the world's fear, enslave the thousands, and to few indeed is it an easy or even possible condition to think, speak, and act with freedom. Religious prejudice ramifies all business pursuits; its devotees are still dictators. This must be overcome, and equality of rights and beliefs established. Absolute Freethought is the basis of all reform; to establish this is the mission of the league; its perpetuity and advancement the aim and method of all Liberal organizations. Therefore let not the standard bearers flag in energy, vigilance, defense, or aggressivness until sectarian influence has become a thing of the past, and all religions or no religion shall stand equal before the law and public sentiment.

Either Col. Ingersoll, Geo. Chainey, or S, P. Putnam would be a tower of light as president of the League—either of the trio who can giv the "whole man" to the work. From our limited outlook, Geo. Chainey seems the man, his soul is girded for and in the work; other professions or business environments do not command him as they do Col. Ingersoll and S. P. Putnam, and the present honored president, T. B. Wakeman. With "concentration, no compromise, and liberality of method" as motto; and Chainey "of noble thought, earnest spirit, and eloquent tongue" as president, victory would seem assured.

One word more: May every Liberal appoint himself a committee of one to advance the cause, disseminate its literature, and urge to united action and effort all within his influence. Let "Ho! for Cassadaga" be the greeting and the effort; canvass your towns, wards, and cities, and assemble en masse at the beautiful camp-grounds, inbreathe the inspiration, listen to the eloquence, the glorious gospel of freedom of those who giv their life and strength for freedom's might, receive there the baptism of love, truth, and fraternity, and ever will you bless your stars that you went to Cassadaga.

A lover of truth and scorner of intrigues,

GRACE L. PARKHURST.

HIGHLANDS, N. C., July 3, 284.

MR. EDITOR: If for a short time longer you will excuse me for not paying the price of the dear old TRUTH SEEKER, I will try to see you paid up soon. I am paying the price, in some small degree, at least, it cost its grand old founder, whose sympathies ran over the walls of prejudice everywhere for the oppressed of all grades, great or small, high or low.

I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since I first became acquainted with it and its honored editor at Wolcott, N. Y., and I would feel lost without it. My business has been dull all winter, and continues so up to the present time. We hope to see it liven up after the Fourth. I sent you our local paper with the free puff for Freethinkers, which will show what kind of Christians we hav here. We hav more Freethinkers than the numbers stated, of all kinds, but only ten are as yet educated up to an understanding of themselvs and the demands before them, else the Christians would hav no power to injure my business. But it seems that that is the thing we are to look out for. When I came here they had no organized church, and Christians and all society were very kind and fraternal, but the money and influence of a very wealthy lady of an overbearing nature soon brought about a change in the condition of society. First, a Presbyterian minister was obtained to reside here, and to organize a church, and now they are building up a very grand church, and I sometimes think that as that goes up I must go down, or my living, rather.

We hav great advantages here for a healthy resort for winter or summer, and I believe I could do well if it were not for this Christian opposition. Several hav told me that if more such men as I am come here good Christians will hav to leave, and the minister says I am tearing down the work he is building up. Of course you see the drift. I must be starved out in order to sustain the holy cause. Several of the Presbyterian ministers come up here every summer, but never stay with us, and worse, I believe the influence of the pious frauds is very damaging to my business. JOSEPH FRITTS.

[Mr. Fritts keeps the "Highlands House," at Highlands, Macon Co., North Carolina, which he advertises as follows: "Altitude nearly 4,000 feet. Summer resort, unsurpassed for equable climate, pure, invigorating air, pure, cold, spring water, and grand mountain scenery. All who try our very long, cool, and delightful summers, whether they come from the South or the North, the West or the East, are alike pleased, and pronounce this the best place east of the Rockies for those who seek health and natural scenery. Invalids are greatly benefited. No musketoes and few flies. Our quiet town of 300 inhabitants is very beautifully located in a large valley on the crest and northwest slope of the Blue Ridge, about four miles from the Georgia line. The hotel is situated in the center of the town. Twenty-five minutes' walk to the top of Mt. Satula, giving one of the mountain views of the whole range. Five miles' drive to the top of the famous Whiteside Mountain. Four miles to the falls of the Cullasaja. Other grand peaks, scenes, and waterfalls too numerous to mention, all within easy distance. Good rooms. Pleasant suites of rooms for families, plainly furnished. Table supplied with the best the markets afford. Terms, $1.25 per day; $6 per week; $20 per month (four weeks). Special rates to families. Satisfaction guaranteed. Come to Seneca City, Walhalla, or Tululah Falls, or via Asheville to Webster or Franklin, and take hack from either place for Highlands, or Cunningham's stage from Franklin to Highlands.]

XENIA, OHIO, June 18, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It is amusing to see our wise men on the old fogy plain of religion, and our wise men on the Liberal side of religion, cross swords and spar away from one year's end to another, without giving us middle men one fact to improve upon. One says that a great or little God made everything that exists out of nothing, when any fool knows that nothing does not exist. The other side says that matter is all the God there is, and that is the only cause that exists. I believe the last theory to be as foolish as the first. If the orthodox God exists, he or she is an object, and no object ever placed itself into existence; hence there must hav been something or somebody prior to their god, or such a god could not exist. The above position is not a debatable one, as there is no reason or philosophy in existence that can upset the truth. On the other side, the Materialists say just as the orthodox do, that there was a time when matter was without form and void, but by and through its own inherent powers it has made millions of objects out of itself. This theory is just as untenable as the other, and neither to me is true, as both positions are only based upon assumptions, without one particle of proof. That matter always existed I believe, but I do not believe that matter of itself has, or ever had, one particle of power, either to act upon itself or any other object. I care not what kind of divisible matter you may take, it is impossible for any man living to demonstrate that matter has one particle of power or motion unless it is acted upon. Now the great question for our wise men on either side to demonstrate and understand, is this, What is it that acts upon and through matter, and places millions of objects in existence? If it is not the orthodox God, or the Materialist's matter, what is it? I defy any man living to prove that a God ever produced one single object out of matter, or that matter, under any conditions, ever produced one single object out of itself. Again, the above being facts, what did form objects out of matter?

I do not deem the orthodox theory of creation worthy a comment, as to me it is a false theory, and nothing else. The Materialists, in my opinion, are, as yet, far from solving the problem. When we reason from analogy, we become satisfied that all planets are heavenly bodies, that hav sufficient oxygen surrounding them to produce a certain amount of light; hav human beings upon their surface, the same, or nearly the same, as the earth, and came into existence in the same way. The Materialists claim that it is the laws of evolution, attraction, and development that giv the power to matter to form objects. This would be a very plausible theory were it not for one fact, and that fact leaves us in the dark. If matter formed all the different objects in existence, under never-varying laws, I would ask, where did the laws come from? It is not only illogical, but absurd, to say that matter created laws, then turned around and produced objects out of itself by using the laws it had created. Laws of every being in the universe are only creatures, and not creators. Now, Mr. Orthodox or Materialist, where did your laws of nature, as you call them, come from? Can any of you answer? There are millions of different laws in existence, but not one that created itself, or one that matter brought into existence. Should you deem the above worthy of space in your paper, I will, at some other time, giv my opinion how law came into existence, when I hope to be able to show that it did not take an orthodox God, or a Materialist's matter, to produce law.

I. D. SEELY, M.D.

STEWARTSVILLE, MO., July 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: About a fortnight ago, one Rev. J. M. Green, of St. Joseph, Mo., came to our godly and priest-ridden town, Stewartsville, Mo., to lecture against Infidelity, and, his friends said, to totally destroy the Infidels, and knock R. G. Ingersoll entirely out of the ring. I went to hear him speak in the Methodist church, and must say that if low slang and vile abuse will destroy Infidelity, then it was certainly destroyed.

Mr. Green then challenged any Infidel to meet him in a discussion. I offered to discuss with him then and there. He refused on the ground that it was Sunday, and not a fit day—for Infidels, I suppose he meant—but said he would meet me, or any other Infidel, even R. G. Ingersoll himself. After three or four weeks a meeting was agreed upon to take place at the Opera House in Stewartsville, on the night of the 30th of June, between Mr. J. E. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kansas, and J. M. Green, of St. Joseph, Mo. On the day appointed both men were here, and the Opera House was well filled. Mr. Remsburg delivered his lecture, one of the finest ever given in this part of the country. But where, oh! where, was the destroyer of Infidelity? Instead of coming to the hall, as was agreed upon, he organized a meeting in the Methodist church, and tried hard to get all the people to go his way, but made quite a failure. He dare not meet us! He dare not let his followers hear the other side, or else, like Othello, his occupation would be gone. This is only one of the many cases where they hav agreed to meet Infidels in an open field, and failed to do so. Does this not show conclusivly that their cause is a bad one. All ought to read Mr. Remsburg's lecture delivered here. It shows what the Bible and Christians hav done, and what the Infidels and Freethinkers hav done. It shows where ignorance and superstition most abound, there the Christians with their hell-making God flourish best. But where education and intelligence hav found their way, Freethinkers and Infidels are fast coming to the front. The world does move, and so do the people. We are now just beginning to see light. May the good work go on till priestcraft, bigotry, and superstition are things of the past. They are fast fading away.

Inclosed please find one dollar, for which you will please send me two copies of the "Crimes of Preachers," and a few of J. E. Remsburg's "False Claims." They are doing good missionary work here. S. N. BRADFORD.

A LETTER TO ELMINA.

SOUTH ROYALTON, VT., July 14, 1884.

DEAR SISTER: Are you sincere in saying you would giv your bottom dollar to know that our departed liv again? When every quarter of the globe is being filled with the wonderful doings of those very spirits whom you so long to hear from and know that they exist; when the sick are healed, the lame made to walk, and mourners are comforted, can you still say, I don't know? Why, right here in South Royalton village we are having cures done through a woman's organism which surpass any recorded in the Bible, except the raising of the dead, and may yet hav that, so many are in a trance and are being buried alive. Mrs. W. S. Russell is a farmer's wife, about fifty, I should judge. She first began to hear voices telling her to go and doctor an old man who had got hurt by a fall. Very reluctantly she did go, and by laying her hands on him and rubbing, she cast out the pain and cured him. Since then she has treated all kinds of sicknesses. One little girl twelve years old fell and injured her spine so she was paralyzed from the waist down—could not feel a pin if inserted in her flesh—for nearly two years. The doctors said she could never walk. Her father carried her in his arms up into Mrs. Russell's rooms. The next day she walked. Her crutches are left for any caller to see. It is needless to tell you her parents were almost crazed with joy, for she was the oldest of the family, and they were very short of what some hav more than they know how to get rid of. She is now at work for two dollars per week.

Another poor cripple, who had not set his foot down on the floor for twenty years, was made to walk by one or two treatments; says two thousand dollars would not tempt him to be put back as he was before. He livs here, and is well-known among the people. Cancers and tumors are being cured and removed from the system. Many cases of lameness caused by rheumatism hav been cured. She has all the patients she can treat in this vicinity and in towns around. Now, Elmina, please tell me what does these cures? Facts are stubborn things. I hav just received a blessing on my poor head from good Brother Seward Mitchell, by way of a postal. Many thanks. I take no credit to myself for that letter to Miss Wixon. I merely obeyed the promptings of the spirit. Also received a note of thanks from Scranton, Pa., from a mourner.

Now I wish Materialists in all candor to tell me why the bereaved heart so hungers and cries out after knowledge and will not be satisfied when the loved ones are laid away out of sight. Not long ago I received a card from an aged man asking me to tell him what real evidence I had that there was another life. Poor old man, he was in the dark, groping his way into the cold grave, and not one ray of light could he see beyond! My heart aches with sympathy for all such, and gladly would I giv them light, and hope, and knowledge too, of the life which awaits every child of earth. These are my humble views, and why should any true Liberals hav any objection to them? In union alone can we as Liberals do our work for humanity. Let us hav harmony of action, and giv the same freedom to others we wish to enjoy, and we can move mountains and fill up valleys until the earth a garden shall indeed become! Men and women shall walk together as brothers and sisters in all the occupations of life, and make one family here as they will be in heaven.

I hav just received from Brother H. L. Green a certificate of membership of the Freethinkers' Association of New York. Many thanks. I will labor for the cause in my humble way. Liberty and freedom to do right shall be my watchword in the future, as it always has been in the past.

MRS. H. J. SEVERANCE.

ST. LOUIS, MICH., July 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of your TRUTH SEEKER for the last three years or more, it being the first and about the only Freethought paper I ever read—having been a devoted Methodist until I was over sixty years of age, endeavoring honestly to lay up a treasure in heaven; but for many years, while serving in the church in the capacity of leader, etc., there were many glaring inconsistencies which I never could reconcile with reason and common sense. For instance, we should always be ready to giv a reasonable answer for the hope that was within us. Our Christian poets said there was "a heaven over yonder skies, a heaven where pleasure never dies; a heaven I sometimes hoped to see, but feared again 'twas not for me"—for if the righteous scarcely be saved, where will the ungodly and the sinner appear—the question being asked, "Are there few that be saved?" and the declaration made that "many should be called, but few chosen—many should come and the door would be shut."

It seems they expected a happy admission, set forth their claim as having cast out devils and in Christ's name done many mighty works. They appear to hav been true believers, but they made some sad mistakes and were denounced—"depart from me, ye workers of iniquity; I never knew you." After volumes of thought on the seeming contradictions and uncertainties of salvation, or of anybody being saved—for if we kept the whole law and offended in one point, we were then guilty of the whole—it occurred to me that there really would be few saved. Then, again, should I accidentally be saved myself, how would I feel not to find in heaven the mother whom I lost when I was a child, and many of my children, and the multitude of friends I hav? In my serious meditation my religion was not very satisfactory to me.

Again, when I read the various doctrins from the different sects, their different theories filled me with utter confusion. Calvinism ran something like this: God did decree before all things just what he meant to do. From out the wreck of human souls he'd save a very few. What a horrible conception of a just and good God!

Since reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, with its many able contributors who labor for the good of their fellow-beings, and suffer imprisonment in the cause of humanity; whose purity of purpose is unquestioned, and who could be trusted to anything, and anywhere, I wish to say to all my Methodist friends and everybody else that I depend entirely upon good behavior; and if perchance any of us should do anything wrong, if it is ever made right we'll hav to do it ourselvs. I do not believe God ever said, "Go kill the Canaanites, the women and the children too." You know it isn't right.

And as for prayer, why, that won't change God's purposes, you know, for he has fixed all things by law to rule this world below.

Oh, how I rejoice in Freethought, this new and cheerful religion! It is growing very rapidly. The scales of ignorance and superstition are dropping fast.

Let us blame no one for anything,
We're undeveloped yet;
The more mistakes and blunders here,
The clearer light we'll get.

O you mighty host of Freethinkers, how I admire you all! You hav come up out of the horrible pit of miry clay; and you are well established.

I hav just been reading D. F. Marrs, of Texas. How I admire his thoughts! How I love to read Freethought! I do not expect to meet any of you. I liv here in the woods. I get THE TRUTH SEEKER regularly and I hav your company constantly; and how cheerful I feel! I think my last days are being my best days.

If I should mention you all by name the list would be too long. Allow me to mention one—"my man," John Peck. I would giv a dollar to shake hands and see him five minutes. But I must close. I enjoy a constant love-feast with you all.

Your honest Agnostic friend, C. P. LUDWIG.

SOUTH BARRE, N. Y., July 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: We would like to say something in honor and memory of the lofty and great hero, D. M. Bennett, but what can we say after reading what was said at the dedication recently by Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, S. P. Andrews, T. B. Wakeman, and all that was said there? We can add nothing but Amen and Amen!

Considering all things, Mr. Bennett, we think, was a wonderful man. Few realize what is sure to come of his real life and teachings. He was closely allied to nature and her laws, and when such laws are better known, then D. M. Bennett will be more fully appreciated. He is to this age what Thomas Paine was to 1776—the former a great neutralizer of the gods, the latter of kings and tyrants. Together they show the duality of nature.

To-day I am sixty-seven years old, having spent twenty years in sleep, ten in unconscious youth, and about ten more lost in extricating myself from and above false teachings from my father (who was a preacher) and other friends; which, by the help of Combe, Huxley, Darwin, Bennett, Paine, Elmina, and a host of others, I hav succeeded in doing, so that I feel cleaner and safer in this life, and this continued, than any of my acquaintance that say they hav been cleansed from all sin by the blood of the Lamb.

Now you all see at my age I hav only twenty-seven years left for reading and reflection, and in view of all that is, and is to be known, how very, very little it is that I know. Thus you see this is sufficient excuse for my not attempting to eulogize our friend and hero, D. M. Bennett. But Robert Ingersoll says in his lecture, "Come, let us be fair now; let us be honest, good friends," etc. We agree with him. Then let us look at this cleansing by blood. Does it not cleanse too much, or too many? The most of our criminals to-day, according to our religious press, go direct from the scaffold to heaven. Now, let us all be fair. I am when I say let me go to hell, or hades, at least—with good, solid, social women and men, including D. M. Bennett and many others. They cannot keep us there long, let us pray.

M. B. DELANO.

BURTON, TEXAS, June 17, 284.

MR. EDITOR: In the working of the notorious murderer and thief, Majors, in California recently, we hav another example of how the recruiting agency for heaven works, but withal, no doubt, the devil was ahead, as the poor old man he had murdered for his cash had no time to thus prepare.

It certainly does seem that our law-makers are blind to the injustice of society, by allowing this silly practice of priests interfering with criminals condemned to the gallows. The very object the law intends as an example to others is defeated in a very great measure by this course, from the fact it detracts from many of the terrors that the execution would otherwise hav, and here is where some of the demands of Liberalism will work well for the good and safety of law-abiding citizens, as well as in many others, if we should ever get them allowed To abolish the clergy from all state and government affairs is sure to cause a healthy reaction that is so much desired.

It cannot be denied that the thieves, murderers, and wrongdoers generally, nearly always take on a full cargo of prayer and faith to sustain their consciences in all sorts of rascality; and why should they not?

Believing in the Bible they can find where it upholds murder, theft, rape, concubinage, and anything else, and in another place it commands, "Thou shalt not kill." But, if you do kill, why, it's O K. God will forgiv you if you only ask. Can there be anything more silly? Indeed, the thief on the cross is constantly being pointed out by the aerial pilots as one of God's double-geared means of salvation, the most infamous doctrin, in my opinion, ever preached, and calculated to inspire the faithful to thieve and murder. When our country becomes enlightned enough to elect such men as Col. Ingersoll president, then, and only then, can we look for true reform.

H. B. JONES.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., July 4, 284.

MR. EDITOR: For one of your most pious readers please giv this pious poem a place in the very pious and logical TRUTH SEEKER:

TRUTH.

Truth, a poem of instructions;
Truth for Liberals to read;
Truth from logical deductions;
Truth does Christian's faith exceed.
Truth, if fully understood—
Truth is universal good.
Truth do seek and find.

Truth is precious and we love it;
Truth most high and holy aim;
Truth above all else we covet;
Truth does giv eternal fame.
Truth, should God and heaven fail—
Truth will triumph and prevail.
Truth do speak and mind.

Truth is truth seeker's ambition;
Truth the glory of the past;
Truth, improving man's condition;
Truth is now progressing fast;
Truth is union, love, and light;
Truth will all mankind unite;
Truth do always heed.

Truth THE TRUTH SEEKER is telling—
Truth that all mankind should prize;
Truth THE TRUTH SEEKER is selling—
Truth, instead of holy lies.
Truth is logical and light;
Truth was Bennett s great delight—
Truth to prove and speed.

Truth we seek and find;
Truth we speak and mind;
Truth we prove and heed;
Truth we love and speed.

E. N. KINGSLEY.

VALLEY FALLS, KAN., June 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please state in your valuable paper whether the taenia echinoccus, or parasite which is described in Mrs. Slenker's "Darwin's," really exists in the dogs of this country, and I am sure you will oblige several of your readers.

Respectfully, YOUTHFUL READER.

MRS. SLENKER'S REPLY.

To "Youthful Reader" I would say that the article treating upon the tape-worn in dogs was taken from one of the most reliable hygienic papers, The Oneida Circular, and the author of it refers us to such high authorities as Prof. Verrell, Dr. Krabbe, and Dr. Cobbold as proof of his statements. We rely on geologists for our information concerning drift deposits, glaciers, rocks, formations, the coal age, etc., and on botonists as to classes, species, and natural localities of plants and trees, and on astronomers for facts concerning stars, moons, planets, comets, and eclipses. And why not rely on medical authorities as to the origin of diseases and their nature?

The dog must go. It is only a question of time. When hunting for wild game is no longer a pastime, and our neighbors' rights are considered to be as sacred as our own, we shall cease to keep dogs to plunder, rob, and steal; to kill sheep and frighten children, or to take bread from the little one's mouths. If, now and then, a dog saves a life, ten more are lost from dog-bites, or might be saved from starvation by food fed to useless, mangey curs. Each man loves his own special canine, and so would he love a bear or wolf if he had one as a companion and a pet. One might pet a black snake, but what right hav we to let it go into the yards and homes of our neighbors, and frighten, annoy, and, perhaps, bite them? True, this is a free country, but no one is free to do wrong. If a dog can be kept at home and insured against annoying others, perhaps there is no wrong in owning it. Nor would there be in owning a cobra or rattlesnake.

Truly, ELMINA.

ONEIDA, July 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. Its weekly visits are like those of a tried and true friend, like a guide upon which we can ever rely. It is sure to bring something good. The articles from the pen of John Peck are alone worth the price of the subscription; and many others are very interesting and instructiv. I liv in a town of churches and grog-shops, and of course we hav plenty of Jesus and him crucified. The Salvation Army nuisance is here—they get some recruits from the dregs of the town. I hav attended one meeting. It reminds me of a play that I used to take part in forty years ago, when I attended school, that we called "Old Bloody Tom." They seem to hav a great deal of trouble with the old orthodox devil. While they were quarreling with his satanic majesty, one of those old-style hymns came to my mind that used to be sung in the churches. I thought I could improve upon it a little. And now I will send it to you and see how you like the improvement:

Now I can read my title clear
To liberty below,
I hav no jealous God to fear,
As Christian people do.

When priests against my soul engage,
And hellish darts be hurled,
Then I can smile at pious rage,
And face a Christian world.

Let Talmage now in fury storm,
And showers of brimstone fall;
His ranting cannot do me harm,
I do not scare at all.

But journeying onward thou my soul
To the spirit home of rest;
And not a sulphurous wave shall roll
Across my peaceful breast.

I guess I hav scribbled about enough for once. I shall send for a few books as soon as I can spare the money. Also for our noble martyr's picture, D. M. Bennett.

Respectfully, G. BEEBEE.

GARFIELD, COL., July 4, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I do not wish to trouble you all the time, but I hav circulated another petition, and therewith I proceed to send you twenty-one names of petitioners for state secularization. This one I circulated here in Garfield and in Monarch Land. Freethinkers are not very numerous here. The harvest is plentiful, but the laborers are few. It is very hard work climbing these mountains looking for Freethinkers; but just as soon as I can find that mountain from whence I can see all the kingdoms of the earth I shall go up and take a look around. I hav been above timber-line quite often, and hav seen but a very small portion of the United States—let alone all the kingdoms of the earth.

Neither Garfield nor Monarch is tormented with a church, and perhaps that is the reason I hav not seen a single intoxicated person here, and Monarch is blessed with six saloons and Garfield with one. It was here proposed to start a Sunday-school, but the undertakers thereof could not make the riffle. It is deemed that the public school is better. A priest came around here last summer to take up a collection for the sisters, and after getting a few dollars he got on a spree. Mr. Editor, as I am not your commander I do not wish to giv you orders what to do and what not to do, but I do believe it would be a good idea to hav the "Iron-clad and Manna Series" bound in volumes, and also the "Truth Seeker Tracts" from No. 140 to 163 with Nos. 11, 12, and 13 of "Scientific Series." But the question is, will it pay to do it?

HENRY BEICHLING.

NORFOLK, NEB., July 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am a constant reader of your paper, but not a subscriber. John Geiger, a gentleman living here, sends it to me, hoping, as he says, to open my eyes on superstition.

Now, Mr. Editor, I wish to ask one question, and I hope you will giv it space in your paper. Nearly all your radical writers go in for liberty; they hold Bob Ingersoll above Christ because, they say, he does more good. Now, I ask, at any of Bob Ingersoll's lectures did you ever know of any one going out and inviting those that were destitute to come in and hav this blessed gospel preached to them? Bob Ingersoll is a lawyer—what more need be said?—but if Liberals are so liberal, why not giv a poor workman, or poor workwoman, a chance to hear your Almighty God? Truly yours, AB SLOCUM.

[Mr. Slocum must be looking for a free ticket. His case is anticipated by two Boston young men who made a wager as to whether the colonel would giv them passes, and when he did, paid the price and had the passes framed as a quietus on just such gentlemen as Mr. Slocum.—ED. T. S.]

ROCHESTER, July 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, for which please send the worthy TRUTH SEEKER one year to the address below. Am pleased with it in most all respects, and hav received it regularly since you received my subscription, or rather from the time I ordered it. You may use my name as being in favor of the petition for state secularization.

Yours as ever for truth, M. E. LISCHER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

A Child's Night-Thoughts.

They put her to bed in the darkness,
And bade her be quiet and good;
But she sobbed in the silence, and trembled,
Though she tried to be brave as she could.

For the night was so real, so awful!
A mystery closing around,
Like the walls of a deep, deep dungeon,
That hid her from sight and sound.

So stifling, so empty, so dreary—
That horror of loneliness black!
She fell asleep, moaning and fearing
That morning would never come back.

A baby must bear its own sorrow,
Since none understands it aright;
But at last from her bosom was lifted
That terrible fear of the night.

One evening the hands that undresssd her
Led her out of the door close by,
And bade her look up for a moment—
Up into the wonderful sky,

Where the planets and constellations,
Deep-rooted in darkness, grew
Like blossoms from dark earth blooming,
All sparkling with silvery dew.

It seemed to bend down and meet her—
That luminous purple dome;
She was caught up in a glory,
Where her baby heart was at home;

Like a child in its father's garden,
As glad as a child could be,
In the feeling of perfect protection
And limitless liberty.

And this had been all around her,
While she shuddered alone in bed!
The beautiful, grand revelation
With ecstasy sweet she read.

And she sank into sound child slumber,
All folded in splendors high,
All happy and soothed with blessings
Breathed out of the heart of the sky.

And I doubt not in like manner
Might vanish, as with a breath,
The gloom and the lonely terror
Of the mystery we call death.

What Stephen's Owl Was Stuffed With.

"What did you bring that horrid old owl here for?" exclaimed Mrs. Diggles, with a frown, as Mr. Diggles deposited on a chair a great brown owl with solemn, yellow-brown eyes that seemed always saying, "I know a great deal more than you giv me credit for!"

"I shall hav to take care of it, I know," continued Mrs. Diggles. "I always do hav to look out for your squirrels, rabbits, horned toads, and all other outlandish jiggeries that you litter the house of with. Oh, dear!"

"I'll take care of him myself, Tabitha," said Mr. Diggles. "Who knows but what he may be of great service to some of us yet!"

"Great fiddlesticks! Who wants such a horrible looking thing as that about the house? See the old fool wink! Such great staring eyes! They say owls associate with ghosts, and all such creatures that go prowling about in the night time," and Mrs. Diggles sighed heavily.

"I thought may be Stephy would be pleased with it, and Etta, too. It might amuse them both," suggested Mr. Diggles.

"I'm sure Etta would not so much as look at the ugly old creature," snapped Mrs. Diggles. "Would you, Etta?"

"No, indeed, ma," lisped Etta. "I hav something else to think of besides such an ill-looking object as that, winking and blinking at nothing."

At that moment Stephy entered the room. "O father, it's a regular owl, a night bird. Where did you get it? What a splendid fellow! What horns! My! but he's a beauty."

"There! I knew you'd like to hav it," said his father, gleefully. "It is only the common American screech owl, but it is a handsome fellow, nevertheless. You can study up about the owl family, and you'll find it quite interesting, I dare say. After all, owls are of great use to humanity."

"How? in what way? I should like to know." snapped Mrs. Diggles.

"Oh, by destroying the mice, destructiv insects, beetles, and the like."

"It's a bird of ill-omen, anyway," said Etta. "All the poets and learned people say so."

"Yes," said her mother, "the scriptures speak disparagingly of it, and almost everybody looks upon it with horror."

"Because they do not know any better," laughed Mr. Diggles. "We will hope this bird will be one of good omen. Do you not know that the old Greeks and Romans made the owl an emblem of wisdom, and dedicated it to Minerva, who was regarded as the goddess of wisdom and liberal knowledge?"

Just then the owl uttered a fearful screech that sent Etta and her mother running from the room, at which Stephy and his father laughed immoderately.

"Never mind, Stephen, we will keep the owl, anyway, no matter what they say, and you must feed it and care for it."

"That I will, father. I'll look out for it, never fear."

Stephen was Mr. Diggles's son by a former wife, and Etta was Mrs. Diggles' daughter by a former husband, and the two children did not get on very well together. They might hav lived very happily, but Etta and her mother were always thinking that Mr. Diggles thought more of Stephen than he did of them, and being each of a fretful disposition, they had a hard time of it all around.

"He brought the ugly bird home just to please Stephen; I know he did," Etta said to her mother. "I've a great mind to kill it."

"I know that is why he brought it home, but it will not do to kill it, for we do not know what might happen to us if we did," and Mrs. Diggles shook her head. I don't know but owls are in league with magicians and things!"

"Pooh! I don't believe that. And still we don't know. His eyes look like cat's eyes. Oh, I think it is just dreadful to be so tormented—how he did screech!" Etta shivered, and drew up her shoulders. "I wish he'd pick Stephen's eyes out."

"You shouldn't say so, my child."

"Can't help it—an old screech owl!" and Etta began to stamp her feet and kick.

Time went on and Etta and Stephen had many a word-battle about the bird, and Mrs. Diggles fretted and sputtered away, and tried to prevail on Mr. Diggles to get rid of it someway, but he paid no attention to her, and the bird lived and throve under Stephy's management.

One day, however, the owl was observed to droop, and the next morning Stephy found him dead in his cage.

"Oh, my owl, my owl!" he sobbed.

"What's the matter with your old owl?" inquired Etta.

"It is dead," sobbed Stephy.

"Glad of it!" chorused Etta and her mother, as they exchanged glances.

"I'll get him stuffed," declared Mr. Diggles, and so he did. When he was brought home, Mr. Diggles said he looked almost as good as new.

"But he can't wink," said Stephy, "and he can't eat, and he can't screech."

"There's your bird of good omen," sneered Mrs. Diggles; "and now you've been to the expense of stuffing him, what does he amount to? I should like to know."

"He may be a bird of good omen, after all," said Mr. Diggles, as he placed the owl, that would screech no more, on the top of the old-fashioned clock in the corner.

"Is he mine, just the same?" asked Stephy.

"Just the same, my boy, he is yours always," and Mr. Diggles patted his son's head.

"Stuffing and all?" said Etta sneeringly.

"Yes, stuffing and all," replied Mr. Diggles.

When Stephy was sixteen he took a notion to go to sea. His father tried to dissuade him from the idea, but nothing would change his mind that was fully made up, and to sea he went.

He started on a whaling cruise, and was gone three years. He came home with some money, some bits of wisdom, and splendid health, but he did not remain home long. He had breathed the air of liberty that a "home on the rolling deep" inspires, and, restless and uneasy, he longed to be riding over the bounding billows again.

Etta and her mother had never noticed him a great deal, and were secretly glad to hav him away. His father, who was growing aged, and who loved him dearly, did not want him to go, however.

"I shall never see you again, my son," he said, with tears in his eyes.

"Oh, you must not think that," said Stephen.

"I cannot liv always, you know," was his answer. "However, if you wish to go, you are old enough to choose, and I will not stand in your way more than I did at first. But if you do not find me here when you come back—"

"You'll find your stuffed owl," laughed Etta.

"Yes, and take care of it Stephen," said his father, "and don't let it get destroyed."

He shipped for another three years, and was soon off for the Arctic seas.

When it was nearly time to be thinking of coming home again, he heard that his dear old father was dead, and then he felt no inclination to return, but, in another port, again shipped for a still longer cruise.

He met with some drawbacks, but he always maintained his integrity, though he picked up some sailor phrases, of course, and used some pretty rough language. Unlike many sailors, he saved what he earned, and placed it in savings banks whenever he went into harbor, so that, eventually, he had a snug little sum of money, all his own, that he had earned himself. After awhile he resolved to go home—he had such a longing to see the old place once more, and, besides, he knew his father had quite a little property that should by right belong to him. He had just been shipwrecked, and was in a sorrowful plight when he presented himself at the door of his old home.

"Good evening!" he said to Mrs. Diggles.

"And what do you want?" inquired that lady.

"A night's longing, if you please. Do you not know me?"

"No, I don't. I suppose you are a tramp."

"I am Stephen Diggles. Do you not know me, Etta?" As he was bronzed by exposure, and bearded by time, he did not wonder they did not recognize him.

"I do not know you, I'm sure," said Etta. "I hav no acquaintance with tramps. What makes your clothes so ragged?"

"I hav been shipwrecked, and lost all I had on board."

"It's too bad—I'm sorry for you, but, of course, your father is dead, if you are Stephen, and things are changed, and—and—and we cannot entertain you here," said Mrs. Diggles, with dignity.

"I—I—don't see the—old owl, anywhere," said Stephen, glancing up at the old clock.

"Oh, the stuffed owl!—why, where is it, Etta?"

"I put it in the attic. I suppose you know, if you are Stephen, that your father made his will, and the homestead and other property is ours, as long as mother lives. I wrote you at the time."

"Yes; I believe you did. But I—would like to—hav—the owl," said Stephen, slowly.

"I shall not dispute your right to it, I'm sure," laughed Etta.

Taking a light, Stephen went slowly up the stairs, and amid the lumber of the attic he picked up the old stuffed owl and came down with it under his arm.

Mrs. Diggles relented somewhat while he was in the attic, and said to him as he came in the room with the owl, "I suppose you can stay all night—I see it is beginning to rain. The bed room in the back chamber is not occupied—you can sleep there, can he not, Etta?"

"I don't care—he looks like a tramp, I'm sure," said Etta, brushing past him.

"No, I thank you, I'll find a lodging somewhere, I guess. Good-night." And off he went, the poor shipwrecked sailor.

"A sailor isn't afraid of a little wetting," said he laughing, and looking into the yellow-brown eyes of his owl.

After some delay, he found a shelter for the night, and was soon sound asleep. He did not know what possessed him to take away the owl, but he fancied it was a remembrance of his boyish days, a boyish freak he thought. He went to sleep thinking of the reception he had met with at his old home, of his dead and gone father, and, lastly, of the poor old dusty stuffed owl.

As he slept he dreamed. He thought in his dream that the owl came and stood on the side of his bed, and winked and blinked as it used to; that presently it began to speak.

"I'm a bird of good omen," it said.

"How do I know that?" he asked. "My father used to say that, but how can I tell that you are?"

"Knock the stuffing out of me and see," screeched the owl.

At that instant, Stephen was awakened by a loud crash. He heard a scampering of rats as he hastily lighted a match to see what was the matter. His owl had been knocked down and thrown upon the floor by the hungry rats, and had, evidently, fallen apart, as the floor was strewn with a number of papers. It took only a minute to light the lamp, and Stephen then began an examination of the papers, which he discovered to be United States bonds to the value of several thousand dollars, together with a large bunch of national greenbacks, sewed tightly in a leather bag, and all labelled and addressed to him in his father's handwriting. There was also a last will of his father, revoking all former wills by him made, and giving all the property he possessed, together with the contents of the owl, to his only son Stephen, after amply providing for Mrs. Diggles during her lifetime.

So Stephen was a rich man all at once, and Mrs. Diggles and Etta were two highly astonished women when the news came out. Stephen's own accumulations, of course, added to his means.

"Who would hav thought it?" said Etta, "such a poor old tramp as he looked to be."

"We cannot always judge by appearances, that is true," remarked Mrs. Diggles. "If I had supposed he was so rich, I would not hav slighted him, I am sure."

"That old owl was a bird of good omen after all," said Etta. "But I wonder if he will turn us out now," and she sighed wearily.

Stephen did not turn them out, but he built himself a new home, and with his money he makes many people happy. He regards wealth as a means to do good, and many a wanderer has felt to heartily bless his name. He does not follew the sea now, but while he helps his fellow-men, he makes a specialty of assisting shipwrecked sailors, and rumor has it that he will erect a Home for that class of our common brotherhood in memory of his father, and it will stand in place of a marble monument, more enduring and superior, inasmuch as it will bless and help the poor and unfortunate, as no marble block or granit pile can do.

GEORGE CHAINEY

Wishes to enter into correspondence with Liberals throughout the country in reference to lecture engagements for the coming season.

Mr. Chainey needs no recommendation from us. We print below a few of his indorsements, which certainly are the strongest testimonials ever given to any Liberal lecturer, except Ingersoll, in this country:

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL: "Mr. Chainey is one of the best thinkers in this country. He has a wonderful command of language, is full of imagery, comparison, antithesis, logic, and beauty. He feels what he says with his whole heart, and perceives it with his entire brain. He is perfectly honest, and for that very reason is intellectually keen. Downright honesty in such a man is genius. He gives a true transcript of his mind, and gives it with great power. He is well acquainted with the church, knows all the ways of the theologian, and understands the inside of the whited sepulcher of superstition. His lectures stir me like trumpets. They are filled with the loftiest spirit. Eloquent, logical, and poetic, they are as welcome and refreshing as the breeze of morning on the cheek of fever."

"Mr. Chainey is a large, well formed, though rather round-shouldered man, wears no beard, and in these days of crops would be called a long-haired man. He has a big head and broad face. He is an orator. His eloquence is his chief fascination. His periods are models of oratorical beauty, and though ordinarily unimpassioned he occasionally becomes intensely strong in his dramatic effects. He is singularly graceful of gesture. His methods inspire one with a conviction of his honesty. His elocution is masterly. His voice is magnetic, powerful, flexible, very pleasing. His sentiments are beautifully painted sacrilege. He would make a famous actor."—Scranton Daily Republican.

"Mr. Chainey's lecture was one of the most brilliant oratorical efforts ever delivered in Creston. We doubt if any lecturer, other than Col. Ingersoll, could use so much of beautiful metaphor."—Creston Commoner.

"Mr. Chainey's enunciation is perfect, his sentences forcible and impassioned. Like Ingersoll he has the happy faculty of clothing an idea in such a peculiarly taking form, that at first thought the contrary idea seems an absurdity and an imposture."—Syracuse Morning Herald.

Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

Echoes of a Rational Sunday.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The inclosed remarks on the religious condition of Brooklyn are from the Brooklyn Daily Eagle. I am not certain that they are worthy of publication, but it is certainly very amusing to hear our "American citizens of African descent" warble their pious notes.

Gibbon, in his "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," says that "a metaphysical religion may appear too refined for the capacity of the negro race." But in this the great historian was mistaken. The African is a born theologian. The mysteries of the Christian religion are to him as familiar as household words. His faith surmounts all difficulties, and his intellect is unvexed by doubt. He, therefore, rides the "Mefodis mule" with a picturesque grace entirely his own.

New York, July 9, 1884. PETER ECKLER.

From the Eagle.

Such frequent efforts are made to deprive the people of Brooklyn of any sort of amusement on Sunday, that the accounts given by our New York, Philadelphia, and Boston contemporaries respectivly of the many thousands of happy and orderly persons who were permitted to enjoy the liberty of listening to delightful music in Central Park, Fairmount and Boston Common last Sunday read like a romance located in some other and less governed country than ours. It seems incredible that the Commissioners of Central Park should hav ventured to brave the moral prejudices of the clergy and the physical objections of the police so far as to furnish rational amusement to the mothers and fathers, husbands and wives, and the attendant young ones who are inseparable from them on Sunday, and allow 60,000 persons to listen to an afternoon concert. We can only account for it by the fact that the clerical inquisitors and guardians of our puritanical Sabbath hav left the wicked city to its fate while they spend their expensiv holidays abroad and that without the prohibition preachers the police of New York hav not moral stamina enough to repress innocent recreation.

It is, perhaps, more extraordinary still that on Boston Common the fourth Sunday concert of this season was given last Sunday afternoon. To the great credit of this once superstitious and persecuting city, in which a man who whistled on the Sabbath would certainly hav lost his tongue or his ears, the municipality has for the past six years expended many thousands of dollars annually upon these Sunday afternoon concerts during the summer. Great crowds assemble on these occasions and are always perfectly orderly, as human beings generally are when rational liberty and amusement are allowed them.

The echoes that come to us from other cities where an increase of individual liberty and of Sunday amusements is being tried so successfully encourage us in the hope that the occupation of these venal inquisitors and censors will soon be gone and that Brooklyn may be as well provided with Sunday recreations as New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. Of such recreations music is undoubtedly the most popular and humanizing, and is the best antidote to depraved tastes and sensual excesses.

The style of Sunday amusement that is now permitted in Brooklyn is described by the Eagle as follows:

There is one troupe of genuin colored men who sing well and accompany themselvs on musical instruments. They hail from the classic region of Crow Hill. They combine the songs of the Mulligan series with camp-meeting melodies, greatly excelling in the latter. The young people are not long in catching the refrain and at a distance one is reminded of the orthodox camp-meeting. A hymn which took well put the believer on the back of a Methodist mule in the ride to glory, the more striking verses being as follows:

I'se got on de back of de Mefodis mule,
Sinner doan' ye stan' dar lookin' like a fool;
De bridle bit am silber, de saddle am gold,
An' I'se boun' fur to go to Aberham's fold.
An' I'll ride,
Yes, I will,
An' I'll ride right on to glory!

I'se sunk my sins in de savin' pool
An' got on de back of de Mefodis mule;
An' here I stick like a big black leetz
Till de ole mule stomp on de gold'n streets!
An' I'll ride,
Yes, I will,
An' I'll ride right on to glory!

Oh! come from de chu'ch an' de Sunny-school,
An' see me ridin' on de Mefodis mule;
Dem Baptists ain't got no sort of show,
An' I'll make dem 'Pistoble bosses blow!
An' I'll ride,
Yes, I will,
An' I'll ride right on to glory!

The spirit with which the singing was executed, not less than the odd mannerism of the colored men, gave the hymn increased interest. The hat was sent around and returned with a goodly sum. This pleased the performers and they responded with another camp-meeting melody. The audience being unable to join in the song whistled the time with all their might and beat time with their feet. The best verses were as follows:

Oh, Master Jesus, take me home,
Wash me, wash me;
Rake off my sins wid a curry comb,
Wash me whiter den sno-ow.

I'se dun got a nuff oh dis ole worl',
Wash me, wash me;
Fur sin flies roun' in a reg'lar whirl,
Wash me, Lawd, sum mo'.

I'd be might hungry afore I'd steal,
Hole me, hole me;
Won't dribe my hogs in anuder man's fiel',
Hole me wid yer han'.

I lubs Mars' Paul an' Peter, too,
Hole me, hole me;
An' I wants to wear salvation's shoes,
Hole me in de han'.

An' er come er long, ole Judy, an' sing ter de Lam';
Come er long, Jasper, come er long Sam;
We'll go up yonder where a groan ain't heard,
An' fly all aroun' wid de wings of a bird.
Oh, dance roun' David's harp.

Let me go 'fore the ole red rooster crows;
Lif' me, lif' me;
Long 'fore de dew is on de rose,
Lif' me up on high.

Ole Job's biles was bo'n on de earth,
Lif' me, lif' me;
But da couldn't last airter his secon' birth,
Lif' me up ter de sky.

When I gits up dar I'll hafter laff,
Push me, push me;
Ter ole ole Aaron without his calf,
Push me thru' de gate.

I'll walk aroun' on de streets ob gole,
Push me, push me;
Wid a ham bone tied ter a sassafrass pole,
Push me 'fore it's too late.

An' er Polly, an' er Dina, an' er Tony, come er long,
Fur ter 'prise de Lawd wid er mighty sweet song,
We's gwine up home whar dar's no mo' pain,
Whar de leaves ain't scorched for de want ob a rain.
Oh, dance roun' David's harp.

ANOTHER NEW BOOK!

New! Eloquent! Elegant! Splendid!

JUST PUBLISHED.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,
WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

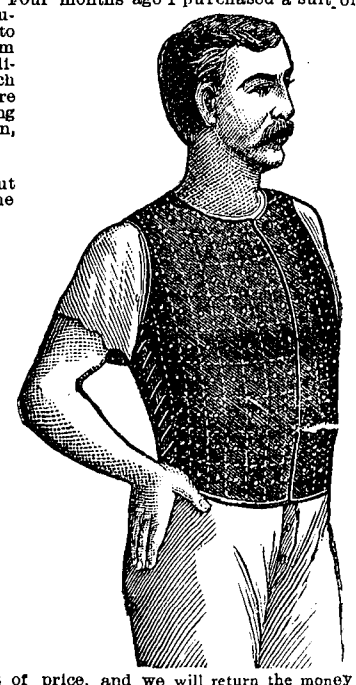
Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain
Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.



DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,
Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselvs. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

CHRONIC DISEASES

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to the mare plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York. To whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of ...

Gems of Thought.

BY general consent it is thought that no system of morality is equal to that which comes from believing the Christian system of religion; and to doubt its claim is held to be the worst of immorality, the worst of sins. There is no greater absurdity than this. Belief is not a matter of choice, not a matter of will, but with people of good intelligence it is a matter dependent upon evidence. It is not a person of sound mind who believes without evidence.—D. M. Bennett.

THE idea of gospel inspiration is received, not from any proof that it so, but from an opinion or feeling that it ought to be so. The doctrin arose, not because it was provable, but because it was wanted. Diviners can produce no stronger reason for believing in the inspiration of the gospel narrativs than their own opinion that it is not likely that God should hav left so important a series of facts to the ordinary chances of history. But, on a little reflection, it will be obvious that we hav no ground whatever for presuming that God will act in this way or in that, beyond what premises analogies may furnish; and in this case no analogy exists.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

"THOU, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity, with all its fears,
With all its hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!"

IT is clear that to prove such a miracle as the re appearance in life of a man who had been publicly slain, the direct and concurrent testimony of eye witnesses would be necessary; that two or more should state that they saw him at such a time and place, and knew him—and that this clear testimony should be recorded and handed down to us in an authentic document. This degree of evidence we might hav had—this we hav not. We hav epistles from Peter, John, James, and Jude, all of whom are said by the Evangelists to hav seen Jesus after he rose from the dead, in none of which epistles is the fact of the resurrection even stated, much less that Jesus was seen by the writer after the resurrection. This point deserves mighty consideration. We hav ample evidence that the belief in Christ's resurrection was very early and very general among the disciples, but we hav not the direct testimony of any one of the twelve, nor of any eye witness at all, that they saw him upon earth after his death. Many writers say, "he was seen;" no one says, "I saw him alive in the flesh."—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

THE new faith—the creed that I explain to you from Sunday to Sunday—may be expressed in a few words. Undoubtedly, in part, it allows of great differences, but the substance of it is thus: that an unknown and unsearchable force lies behind creation, protects and impels us. The course of things has been from the lowest rudimental beginning onward and upward to the present point, and is destined to pass beyond this point to unimaginable splendor. The world of man lives, is growing, is making from year to year, ay, from day to day. The race of man is making. Man is the real creator. Man is the real caretaker. Man is the ultimate ruler. Therefore, the actual movement of the world depends not upon this personal individual, of whom it is said that he touches the spring to open the organized forces which drive the wheel.—Frothingham's Life as a Test of Creed.

THAT man Longfellow twists a few simple words about a meditativ dawdler, and a bridge, and the moon, and the water, and a church clock, into the simplest rhyme; and lo! the hardest wretch who ever read mathematics cannot hear it sung without a sensation in his throat and a mist before his eyes. Arrange the words any other way, and they are dull and meaningless; alter a syllable and the magical music is broken into discord. So the notes that make "Hope Told a Flattering Tale," or "The Last Rose of Summer," would make a serio-comic ethiopian melody, if you twisted them another way; and it is, after all, the arrangement that makes the genius. . . . You and I will sit still and enjoy ourselvs, my dear, happily conscious that every day a hundred aching brains are racking themselvs to find out something for our advantage—from the amiable philanthropist who devotes his attention to our kitchen stoves, to the monomaniac who tries to find for us the philosopher's stone.—Miss Braddon's Sir Jasper's Tenant.

A WISE minister would rather preserve peace than gain a victory, because he knows that even the most successful war leaves nations generally more poor, always more profligate than it found them. There are real evils that cannot be brought into a list of indemnities, and the demoralizing influence of war is not the least of them. The triumphs of truth are the most glorious, chiefly because they are the most bloodless of all victories; deriving their highest luster from the number of the saved out of the slain.—Colton's Lacon.

YET much remains
To conquer still; peace hath her victories
No less than war; new foes arise
Threatening to bind our souls with secular chains;
Help us to save free conscience from the paw
Of hireling wolves, whose gospel is their maw.
—Milton's Sonnets.

BEES! BEES! BEES!

FROM $2,000 TO $5,000 A YEAR KEEPING HONEY BEES

The particulars are simply to prevent the great loss that most bee masters hav to contend with annually. Then giv the bees a chance to increase and collect surplus honey to their fullest capacity; all of which can be easily accomplished by using the kind of hive described in "Kidder's Secrets of Bee-keeping."

Send for the Book and see how easily it can be done with a few swarms of bees.

THIS BOOK IS A RELIABLE GUIDE

to all persons that keep bees, especially to the novice or new beginner, as it teaches how all of the troubles and disappointments that the bee master is liable to, can be successfully overcome, such as Foul Brood, Dysentery, Bee Robbery, Ravages of Moth Millers, Loss of Queen, loss of bees in Swarming time, by their flight to the forests, also the great loss in winter and early spring management, which is usually more than all other ways combined. This book will also inform the bee master HOW BEES WILL INCREASE AND THROW OFF SWARMS to an enormous extent, all conditions being favorable. The old stocks will frequently swarm three or four times each, and oft times the first swarms thrown off will swarm once or twice each, with a good hive and right kind of management. In warmer climates the bees will increase and swarm to a much greater extent.

GREAT YIELD OF SURPLUS HONEY.

This Book will inform the bee master how to get the greatest amount of surplus honey, and at the same time hav it in small packages weighing three-quarters of a pound to two o: three pounds, as may be desired, which will command the highest price in market. In a good season the bee keeper may calculate on two or three hundred pounds of surplus honey from each old stock, and from fifty to one hundred pounds from the earlier young swarms, especially if they do not over-swarm.

NO MORE BEE-STINGS IN MANAGING BEES.

The Book will post the bee-keepers how to manage them when putting them on, or taking off surplus honey boxes, and not get stung in the whole operation.

BEE-KEEPING FOR OUR SONS AND DAUGHTERS.

It being the most pleasant, as well as the most profitable business that young people can engage in, and at the same time remain at home with their parents. The author has known of several young men who commenced the culture of the bee in their teens, and are now making more money than their fathers who run the farm, and doing it easily and with small investments. We must also remember that the women folks often make the best of bee-keepers, and not so liable to neglect them as the men folks.

KIDDER'S BEE BOOK

should be in the hands of all persons who like honey, and take an interest in the little honey bee. It contains more matter than many books that sell for two dollars, and is embellished with numerous cuts and drawings. There is no trouble, loss, or damage that a bee master has to contend with but what the book will giv the proper remedy by simply referring to the index, and that will point to the page where it is fully explained.

In order to bring this book more prominently before the mass of bee keepers, the Author proposes to giv, as a premium to each purchaser of a book, from this date until Aug. next, the privilege of making his Celebrated Patent Bee Hive, as spoken of in book, for their own use (but not to sell) Free of Charge, otherwise there will be the usual Patent Fee of Five Dollars to each individual that wishes to make and use the hive

PRICE, BOARD BOUND, 75 cents; CLOTH, 85 cents.

N. B. The directions for hive making with cuts, drawings, etc., will be inclosed within each book sold, until Aug. next, (not longer). Now is the time for all bee-keepers to avail themselves of this liberal offer, which is simply to buy a book at the Regular Price, before August next CHOOSING a wife is very much like ordering a meal in a Paris restaurant when you don't understand French. You may not get what you want, but you will get something.

A WESTERN paper says: "Mr. Meeker, of Argo, Col., has a duck that laid an egg with a nickel embedded in the yolk." This is not a freak of nature. It is a newspaper lie.

"BEGORRA, I've always been a Dimmycrat, but I'll vote for Logan this toime," exclaimed an enthusiastic Irishman on the glorious Fourth. When asked his reason, he replied, "Shure an' the papers sez he murders the English, and be the powers Oi'm down on the English!"

JOHN L. SULLIVAN has returned to Boston from his triumphal tour across the continent. It is understood that Mr. Sullivan will lecture this year before the Concord School of Philosophy on "The Whatness of the Finite Henceforth; or, the Ultimate Environment of the Protoplasmic Germ; a Monograph in Four Rounds."

BISHOP WURTZBURG, a noted clergyman, used to delight in telling a joke at his own expense. He was walking in a meadow, when he met a little shepherd lad. "What are you doing, my son?" said the bishop. "Tending swine, your reverence." "How much pay do you get?" "One florin a week." "I am also a shepherd," continued the bishop, "but I hav a much better salary." "That may all be, your reverence, but then I suppose you hav more pigs under your care," replied the boy.

"LUCY," said Rutherford B. Hayes a few days ago as he was mixing some dough for the little chickens, "did you hear that General Grant has lost all his money in Wall street?" "Yes," answered Lucy in a dry, husky tone of voice, "I read something about it in the papers. That comes of not having a wife that is able to take care of him and his money, Rutherford. You never lost any money in Wall street, did you?" "No, ma'am," said Rutherford. "Well, just let me know when you do." "Yes, ma'am." And Rutherford went out to feed the cunning little new spring chicks.

A WORLDLY man stood in the Milwaukee & St. Paul Depot last Sunday afternoon waiting for a train to take him north, when he was approached by a solemn-faced young man who handed him a tract entitled, "A Guide to Holiness." "I wish you would read this," remarked the young man. The worldly man glanced at the title and looked up, saying, "I ain't going that way, but if you hav got a guide to some cool summering place where there's plenty of good fishing, trot 'er out an' I'll buy it." The young man turned and walked away, feeling that his efforts in a good cause would be better appreciated in Africa.

A WICKED, unregenerate, and profane man once journeyed through the South, in the land that is over against Mason and Dixon's line, and behold he met a large multitude upon the way; and he said unto one of those whom he met, "Whither go ye?" And they answered him, "Even unto the baptism," which is after the manner of that country. And he turned about and followed them even unto the rink whereat they did baptize. Now, it so happened that when the preacher had washed away a slough of sins and was about through, the profane man from the San Juan, who stood by the shore, seeing that the preacher was aweary and that he approached the bank for to come out, put forth his hand to aid him; but behold, when he put forth his hand the preacher rallied and jerked the worldly man from San Juan into the water and proceeded to baptize him with the usual extempore remarks. The profane man sought again and again to excuse himself, and even with tears to set forth that he had not been regenerated, and that owing to the panic he had failed to meet with a change of heart, but the preacher would not listen to it. He immersed the ungodly man from San Juan, and asked how he felt. Forgetting for the moment the peculiar circumstances by which he was surrounded, the profane man answered that he felt O. K., but it would be a d——d long time before he attended another baptism.

A YOUNG man who was recently converted at Harrison's revival was going up-town last Wednesday evening, and on the way he passed by Ingle Street Church. He noticed that the church was lighted up, and then he remembered that probably their prayer meeting came on that evening, so he smoothed his curls with his hand and entered. Five minutes had scarcely elapsed before the minister rose up and thanked the Lord that a young newspaper man had checked his wild career and come to Christ for blessing; then he eyed the young man who had just come in, and asked him to lead in prayer. Now it happened that the young fellow had never prayed in his life, and was completely caught off his guard by the request. The cold sweat oozed from his brow, and he felt his breath gradually leaving him. He clutched wildly to regain it, but it went upward to the ceiling, and there danced for an instant or two. One second passed—two—then three—and yet not a word was offered up. The minister was kneeling, his head was bowed in his hand, and the congregation, too, were bowed down. The young man gazed vacantly around, and observing that no one was looking, he stealthily left his seat and made a sneak for the door and slid out for home. There is no telling how long the congregation remained upon their knees before they ventured to look up, but when they did they probably called on some older brother who had more experience in wrestling with Satan. The young man has been dodging the members of that congregation ever since, and goes along the streets looking ahead with a wild and harassed look that is painful to behold.—Evansville Argus.

BOWDOIN COLLEGE, at Brunswick, Me., has made Blaine an LL.D.

SPURGEON, the great English preacher, is laid up with the gout, but as he does not use his legs for gesticulating purposes, his oratory is not impaired. Talmage should not eat too much rich food, or it may interfere with his eloquence.

IN Russia, the people are bound to hav blood at any cost. The latest slaughter is being indulged in by the Christians. Whenever a Christian finds a man that doesn't believe in his religion, he prepares him for a funeral ceremony by gently choking him to death, or, if the man is long-winded, they run a knife into him.—Peck's Sun.

MRS. BESANT, in the National Reformer, says that Mr. Bradlaugh was a member of the Grand Lodge of Masons of England until the Prince of Wales was elected Grand Master, when he sent in his certificate and withdrew on account of the notoriously immoral character of the prince. Yet Mr. Bradlaugh's Atheistical opinions had been proclaimed openly throughout the kingdom for upwards of twenty years.

"THIS is all nonsense about Russia being behind the times," said a Wall-street banker who was reading a newspaper to another gentleman. "I don't know, but I don't think there is much civilization in Russia." "You don't, eh? Well, just read this account of a government official having gotten away with 10,000,000 rubles. If that's not a sign of civilization, then we Americans are a race of barbarians."

FREDERIC HARRISON, the distinguished writer and Positivist, says in the Freethought Review (Wanganni, N. Z.) that Henry George is trying to import into England the morals of a Californian bandit and mail-robber. This is hardly correct, for Californian bandits do not, we suppose, justify their actions to their victims. If Mr. George is a bandit, he is one with a benevolent purpose, though we approve as little as Mr. Harrison does of some of his doctrins.

A GERMAN Catholic bishop has sent around a circular urging all the faithful in his diocese to offer up prayers for newspaper editors. This is very kind of the bishop, but the man who does not take or pay for a newspaper needs praying for first. There is really no occasion to offer up any special prayers for editors in Germany, as they are, for the most part, included in the general prayer for those who are in prison and under bonds, or in any trouble of mind, body, or estate.

SOME time ago the emperor of Japan issued an edict prohibiting a particular class of public discussions. The Tokio Times thus explained the government order: "Great numbers of unsanctioned debating assemblages hav been held, the speakers in which hav often proclaimed the extremest theories of Communism, and, arguing upon the basis of Proudhon's maxim that 'property is robbery,' hav expressed a lively dissatisfaction with the relativ pecuniary condition of classes in Japan. It is not thought advisable that sedition and Socialism be quite so freely advocated; hence the edict, which applies exclusivly to unlicensed gatherings for the purpose of general and political deliberation."

MASSACHUSETTS is becoming somewhat alarmed at the growth of illiteracy, as she may well be. The last census showed that there were in the state 75,635 persons above the age of ten who could not read, being 5.3 per cent of all persons above that age, a proportion which is exceeded by no other Eastern state except Rhode Island. The last legislature passed a law which it is hoped will tend to check the advance of this percentage. It provides that any person who employs a minor fourteen years of age who cannot read and write shall forfeit from $20 to $50, and that any person who employs a minor over fourteen years of age who cannot read and write, providing such minor has been for one year a resident of a city or town wherein free evening schools are maintained, shall forfeit from $50 to $100 for every such offense, to go to the benefit of the evening schools.

AFTER August Roddert attempted suicide at Woodhaven, L. I., recently, a story got abroad which connected his name with that of Mrs. James Solly. Roddert had been treasurer of the Congregational church, and Mrs. Solly was the secretary of Daniel's Band, a temperance organization in the church. The church took the matter up, and expelled both. Neither is now in the village. Just before church time on Sunday morning, Mrs. Solly's husband appeared before the church door and inquired for Dominie James. His manner made Mr. J. Prall, one of the members, ask him why he wanted to see Mr. James. He replied that the Congregational church had ruined his family, and he wanted satisfaction. He then stood in front of the church, and warned people not to enter. "It will ruin you," he said. "It is worse than hell. Dominie James and the church-members are all hypocrits." When Mr. James approached the church with his wife, Mr. Solly shouted, "Here comes the gray-headed old sinner." Mr. Prall cautioned Mr. James to keep away. When it was proposed to send for Constable Abrams, Mr. Solly shouted: "Sam Abrams won't arrest me. I'm a God-fearing man, but you're a lot of scoundrels. I'll stand in front of this church every Sunday until I break it up."

ONE of the funniest things in the presidential campaign is the posing of "Old Subsidy Pom" as the candidate of the religion and morality party. Truly, "politics make strange bed-fellows." The handful of righteous men who desire to save this political Sodom from destruction by abolishing secret societies, putting God in the Constitution, enforcing prohibition in the nation, and doing various other things too numerous to mention, and who rejoice in the name of the American Prohibition party, hav certainly selected a most worthy representativ of the good, the beautiful, and the true. It does not take a long stretch of memory to recall the time when Senator Pomeroy was driven out of public life for bribery and corruption. The scene in the Kansas legislature, where York shook the intended purchase money in the face of the senator, is almost too fresh in the public mind to let the cloak of reform cover up Pomeroy's record. At that time "Pom" was a member of a secret society, too. But then he may be the best kind of a candidate after all, on the same principle that a reformed drunkard makes the best temperance lecturer, because, owing to his familiarity with all that is disreputable in politics, he can "speak by the card."

MR. SPURGEON said very naively that he did not depend upon advertisments or any lay methods for his charitable income—about £10,000 a year—but simply on prayer. They prayed for cash, and God sent the cash. This sounds strong, no doubt, observes the London Truth, but it never seemed to occur to him that Spurgeon and his tabernacle are about the most colossal form of advertisment going in this or any other country, and that the intense esprit de corps of several thousand more or less self-righteous and conceited persons, is next to the seductions of rank and fashion, about the most formidable as well as the most secular agency for levying charitable moneys in existence. We do not grudge him or his people their beliefs, nor would we damp anyone's faith and ardor in Mr. Spurgeon's good causes; but do not let us hav prophetic and religious "bunkum" where explanations of a quite sublunary nature will suffice. As for Mr. Muller, at Bristol, who also prays for cash, he obtrusivly noises abroad the fact that he is constantly asking heaven for five-pound notes, and that a number of children will starve if he doesn't get them. What is this (unconsciously, no doubt) but an advertisment exactly fitted to draw cash from the pockets of all who believe in the power of prayer? However, I don't wish here to criticise Spurgeon in any unfriendly spirit. We are all proud of him; we all deceive ourselvs a little about our motivs, and overestimate our own importance, when, perhaps, we hav not quite so much real importance as Spurgeon has to overestimate; only I must say that for a man who openly professes "Calvinistic theology" and "Puritanical morality" Mr. Spurgeon certainly takes a smiling, if rather narrow, view of life on Beulah Hill, and from that pleasant vantage ground appears to contemplate the predestination to eternal torments of the great majority of the human race with tolerable equanimity.

"YOUNG FREETHINKER" writes to say that "in many instances the words of the Bible are untrue as applied to our own times," and he says: "Take the passage, 'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing?' I say they are not." Oh, well, I agree with "Young Freethinker" that the passage quoted may not apply to this day and this generation. But that is the fault of the generation; the Bible is all right. It is only we who are wrong. Two sparrows were sold for a farthing then, and I don't suppose that inspiration itself could foresee that, in in the year 1884, in the United States of America, a race of human beings would wring from a starving neighbor $1.75 for a spring chicken no bigger than a robin, or $2 for a squab three days out of the shell, and would sell a peck of peaches in a two-quart basket, and would make butter out of dead cattle, and when their children asked for bread would giv them a preparation of alum, and would catch imported sardines off the coast of Maine, and would sell "bob veal" in the public markets, and would mix split peas in the coffee and sand in the sugar. I suppose it was the intention to burn the old globe up before a generation arose that was capable of doing such things. Of course you can't make the Bible fit our day, my son. Omnipotence couldn't do that without making a hopeless wreck of the Bible. But you can make our day and generation fit the Bible? Suppose you try that. Commence at the other end of the bridge, and by the time you get Wall street fitted to the Sermon on the Mount you will be gratified to see that you hav landed the country safely on the old "two sparrows for a farthing" basis.—Robt. J. Burdette.

MR. JOSEPH SYMES has gone to Australia as a Freethought missionary, and he finds much sympathy with our cause in that land. He is not a sanctimonious hypocrit in a white choker, but a vigorous gentleman, able to defend his cause and friends, if we may judge by a paragraph from a letter he wrote to Mr. Bradlaugh. He was on board a steamer returning from a trip to Adelaide, a port some forty-eight hours from Melbourne, when he "was nearly in a fight." Mr. Symes tells the story as follows: "A fellow in the shape and garb of a gentleman, and speaking the English language with tolerable correctness, calling himself a merchant, began in the most disgusting manner to abuse Mr. Bradlaugh, of whom I soon found he knew about as much as my umbrella. I warmly resented his conduct, and some very high words passed between us. Then he proceeded to abuse Mrs. Besant, and our words became more fierce. I told him he must be a low scoundrel to abuse people so much his superior in the style he adopted. He threatened to throw me overboard! I stepped toward him and invited him to try his hand at it, which he declined to do. I denounced him in the most vigorous language I could command, and the passengers gathered round me, at first with a good deal of clamor, putting questions by the dozen. 'Giv us a Freethought lecture!' cried one who evidently knew me. 'I am on private property, and hav no right to do that,' said I. 'If you want a rational discussion, appoint one of your number, and let us speak alternately,' continued I. Things became cooler, and a discussion ensued, of about two hours long, not, however, arranged as I desired, but more or less desultory, my chief opponent being a Mr. Walker, secretary of the Adelaide Young Men's Christian Association. At the close I had gained a great many friends, and the slanderer discovered that he had made a mistake, and was most silent and grave for the rest of the voyage. On the other hand, several passengers had private and genial conversations with me respecting the views I entertained upon religious and social subjects. Thus Freethought is propagated by the very abuse which unscrupulous and ignorant fellows direct against it."

News of the Week.

THE authorities in England and Ireland still discover immature dynamite plots and concealed ammunition in both countries.

THE French continue their war in Madagascar without success, being repulsed in an attack of 1,200 men upon the Horas June 26th.

LONG ISLAND, the site of so many recent tregedies, was aroused on July 22d by an attempted outrage at Ravenswood upon a young German girl of fourteen years, who, however, managed to escape before the villains, two in number, could accomplish their purpose.

ON July 20th Lizzie Bradley, a demented young girl living near Pittsburgh, wandered away from home, and after several days was found in a dying condition near a fishing camp up the Monongahela River. She had been outraged, maltreated, and robbed by the men of the camp, fifty of whom hav been arrested.

THE violence of the cholera is decreasing in Toulon and Marseilles, but increasing in surrounding villages. The total number of deaths in France since its outbreak is 1,000. The number of cures is 500. The total number of places in that country in which it has appeared is fourteen. Many hav committed suicide through fear, or upon first attack, and many become insane. The present epidemic, however, has not the same virulence that has characterized previous outbreaks, appearing to hav attacked sickly individuals rather than whole sections of the population. It has appeared at Spezzia, Italy, having been carried there by an Italian workman from the arsenal at Toulon.

STATEMENTS which hav been published that the leaders of the Anti-Monopoly party hav become dissatisfied with Gen. Butler, because of his delay in issuing his letter accepting the Anti-Monopoly nomination for president, and hav therefore decided to work for Cleveland, are contradicted by John F. Henry, president of the National Anti-Monopoly League, who says: "The fact that Gen. Butler attended the Democratic National Convention as a delegate does not, as reported, appear to us inconsistent with his position as nominee of the Anti-Monopoly party. In his own time he will probably address a letter to the Anti-Monopoly party through me, and I hav every reason to believe that the letter will be a stinging review of the letters of the other candidates. We shall then go on and nominate our presidential electors in the different states in the interest of the Anti-Monopoly and labor men, and of the so-called Greenbackers. Blaine took six weeks to prepare his, and Cleveland's is yet to come. Possibly Gen. Butler desires to see how Cleveland will straddle the tariff plank."

THE National Prohibition Convention was held at Pittsburgh, Pa., July 23d and 24th. It resembled in many respects the old time antislavery conventions, but differed, however, in having a much larger proportion of orthodox ministers. It was profusely supplied with pamphlets and tracts and other means of propagating ideas. The sessions were opened by the singing of "John Brown" and similar songs. Upon the vote all nominations save that of Ex-Gov. P. St. John, of Kansas, turned out to be merely complimentary formalities, he being unanimously elected. The platform, which was adopted with acclamation and no opposition of any moment, arraigns both Republican and Democratic parties with severity. It is backed by a mass of voters which is causing anxiety to both old parties. The number of votes they will cast is estimated at from half a million to a million. The Prohibitionists, says the Sun, are a highly respectable body, in dead earnest, and cannot be persuaded or bribed out of their opinions. Under ordinary circumstances their votes would be thrown against Mr. Cleveland, because the Democratic Convention has adopted an unequivocal declaration against liquor prohibition; but as they will support a candidate of their own, and as most of them were originally Republicans, it remains uncertain which of the two great parties will be helped and which will be damaged by their action.

The Annals of Tacitus a Forgery.

Before concluding our life of Paul, we deem it necessary to remove the only vestige of heathen testimony as to the crucifixion of Christ under Pontius Pilate. For two years the passage from the so-called "Annals" of Tacitus concerning the persecution of Christians by Nero has served as the strongest prop of historical Christianity, next to the now admitted forgery in Josephus.

In 1829, Robert Taylor proved that Cornelius Tacitus never could hav written such a passage. In 1878, further evidence was adduced by us to prove the forgery. We discovered that in the description of Nero's persecution the author of the "Annals" plagiarized a passage from Sulpicius Severus, an elegant Christian scholar, who died A.D. 420. In the "Annals" we found a sentence of twenty-five words, eighteen of which are identical and consecutiv in Severus. If the learned Christian father had found those words in the writings of the heathen historian, he surely would hav credited and not stolen them. Such testimony in favor of historical Christianity was too valuable to be slighted by churchmen in the year 400. Nor does Severus introduce into that passage the names, Christ, Christian, or Pontius Pilate. These are added by pseudo Tacitus in the fifteenth century.

Cornelius Tacitus is supposed to hav been born about A.D. 53. But this is based upon a letter of Pliny in which he speaks of himself and Tacitus as "nearly of the same age" (B. vii, 20); and another in which he says he was "but eighteen years of age" at the time of the eruption of Vesuvius, which was August 24, A.D. 79 (vi, 16). From this the date of Pliny's birth is fixed A.D. 61 or 62. But we dispute the authenticity of the Letters of Pliny.

The author of a masterly work published in London in 1878, entitled, "Tacitus and Bracciolini," without discrediting the Letters of Pliny, controverts the statement in those letters that Tacitus and Pliny were "nearly of the same age;" and adduces most cogent evidence that the former was born at least as early as A.D. 44, and was therefore past seventy-three when he paused in writing his "History," which would hav made him eighty or ninety when he began the "Annals" (chap. i).

Three unquestioned works of Tacitus hav come down to us—namely, his "History," "Germanicus," and "Life of Agricola." The "History," which is unfinished, begins with the reign of Galba (A.D. 68), because, as he says, others had written Roman history up to that time most admirably. If, therefore, he afterwards wrote the "Annals" embracing the time of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, he performed a work that he knew to be superfluous.

The following statement in Taylor's "Diegesis" (p. 393) is fully confirmed by the researches of the author of "Tacitus and Bracciolini," whose name is supposed to be Mr. Ross:

"The first publication of any part of the 'Annals' of Tacitus was by Johannes Vindelinus de Spire, at Venice, in the year 1468 [1469 or 1470]; his imprint being made from a single manuscript. . . . From this manuscript . . . all other manuscripts and printed copies of [this part of] the works of Tacitus are derived."

Robert Taylor did not suspect the whole of the "Annals" to be a forgery. Mr. Ross has proved it, both by internal and external evidence. Some of his points we now briefly present:

1. Three passages in the "Annals" agree almost verbatim with Sulpicius Severus. (The last one of these is the passage we also discovered in 1878.) In the first one, out of twenty-one words sixteen are identical and almost consecutiv in Severus; in the second, seven out of eleven are the same; in the third, eighteen out of twenty-five. But Mr. Ross points out that in the last passage Poggio changes cum to ubi, which is a grave grammatical error. Severus was too good a Latin scholar to write ubi for "when," but Poggio in the fifteenth century, though one of the best Latinists of his time, makes frequent errors of that sort, as might be expected.

2. It cannot be discovered that a single reference was made to the "Annals" by any person from the time when Tacitus lived until shortly before 1469, when Vindelindus of Spire first published the last six books, forty years after their discovery by Poggio.

3. It is generally supposed that Jornandez, bishop of Ravenna, A.D. 552, refers to the "Annals" in speaking of "Cornelius etiam annalium scriptor;" but the passage quoted is about Meneg in Cornwall, and is nowhere to be found in any ancient Roman writer. Furthermore, the name "Annals" was not given to these books by anyone until 1533. In all the MSS. the title is, "Ab Excessu divi Augusti Historiarum Libri," and the title of the genuin work of Tacitus is, "Augustæ Historiæ Libri." In 1574 Lipsius distinguished the two works by calling one "Annals," and the other "Histories." Jornandez, therefore, never heard of the "Annals" of Cornelius Tacitus.

4. No MS. whose existence can be traced back further than the 16th century contains the whole of the "Annals," and no MS. that can be traced back further than the first half of the fifteenth century has the closing books of the "Annals." The MS. first discovered which supplied the last six books is lost, and that which contains the whole (i. e., first six and last six books) is of an age that nobody can determin.

5. A speech of Claudius is given in the "Annals." In 1528, more than a hundred years after Poggio wrote that speech, a copy of the genuin speech was discovered at Lyons, totally unlike the fabricated one in the "Annals."

6. London is described as "remarkably celebrated for the multiplicity of its merchants and its commodities" in the reign of Nero, A.D. 60. If it existed at all at that time it was a very insignificant town. As late as the fourth century the people of London were only exporters of corn, and importers of polished bits of bone, toys, and horse-collars. Poggio's description of the city answers to 1420, when he was there.

7. The author's sojourn in London also accounts for an obscure passage in the "Annals," in which he says that "a form of government based on a selection and conjunction of the commonalty, the aristocracy, and a monarch, if realized, cannot last." Such was the constitution of the English government in 1420, and it seemed to be unlikely to stand.

8. He speaks of the oracle of Apollo Clarius as existing in the reign of Claudius. Strabo, who lived in the time of Augustus, says that in his day it no longer existed.

9. He limits the reign of Bardanes in Babylon to less than a year, and has him die in early youth by assassination—A.D. 47. Bardanes reigned long, lived to a good old age, and died a natural death (Philostratus's Life of Apollonius).

10. He speaks of the capture of Nineveh in the reign of Claudius. Strabo says that not a trace of it was left in his time, and Lucien tells us it was destroyed when the Assyrians were overthrown. The statement in the "Annals" is probably taken from Marcellinus, an unreliable historian of the fourth century, whose work was discovered by Poggio.

11. The author of the "Annals" is the originator of the blunder by which the Emperor Augustus is called Octavianus, instead of Octavius, his real name.

12. He has falsified history by making Cumanus and Felix for a time joint governors of Judea. Cumanus was governor of the Samitarians; after his banishment Claudius sent Felix to be governor of Judea, Galilee, Samaria, and Perea (Jos. War, ii, 12, § 8).

13. So much bad Latin has been published in the "Annals" that scholars hav imputed to Tacitus a want of knowledge of his nativ tongue. For example, in that work a monosyllabic preposition is often placed between a substantiv and an adjectiv or pronoun, as "lacu in ipso," "judice ab uno," "urbe ex ipsa." This usage is tolerated in poetry, but not in prose-writing; it is not found in the other works ascribed to Tacitus, nor in any of the ancient Latin prose writers. In short, the genuin works of Tacitus are free from all the grammatical blemishes found in the "Annals."

Theological Re-Creations.

We premis by declaring our love and veneration for sincere disciples of Jesus, the Nazarene, whose supreme modern type has been Oberlin, of Steinthal. It is needless to remark that such characters no more than Pope's humble Man of Ross can be touched by the generic term "parasite." True and appropriate for the rank and file of priests, of all ages, countries, and faiths, it suffers other special exceptions where the priests, as in Egypt and Peru, hav been also the national scientists and administrators in the practical economies of the state, embracing agriculture and the useful arts. On the same principle, though as but a volunteer militia in the army of industrial progress, we except from the stigma of parasitism the Benedictine monks, who heralded Europe's renaissance in their revival of horticulture. Rari nantes in gurgite vasto.

THE CLERICAL PARASITE.—Among animal poisons are distinguished the viruses and venoms. The viruses (some of which are now known as nucrophytic) occasion diseases of a regular and characteristic evolution and catastrophe more or less grave, from chickenpox to the malignant pustule. The venoms are characterized by their aplasmic potency, fluidifying blood, and determining extravasation, which facilitates this aplasmic venom—which, for the bloodsucker but a trivial accessory to its purpose, is for its prey an affliction far greater than the loss of blood. Over with some in a minute or two, with others it continues several days. Of some insect bites the wound is mortal, or chronic diseases result from them. We are thus prepared to expect very serious results from conscience-poisoning by the clerical insect in its parasitic suction. Such is the nature of church venoms. How subtle may be divined by the humility of kings, in kneeling before popes who kick off their crowns —à la mode ancienne. Slaves of clerical doctrins hav just as much will left, in face of their masters, as may suffice for a sheep to get shorn.

The Catholic church economizes this woorara for its own clerical administration and revenue. The Protestant declares for laical and democratic autoxy. In consequence, the Catholic may leave his confessional box light-hearted, as well as light-pursed; whereas sin with the good Protestant has the depressing force of a chronic disease. That is, supposing identical temperaments; for the Italian may season his maccaroni with doctrins that would stiffen out an Englishman, just as a bear don't mind taking arsenic enough to kill a deer, and fowls fatten on nux vomica that kills the hawk.

Infinitesimal doses of venom, such as are infused by insects of the temperate zone, like the doctrinal impression of a fashionable church service leave on fat skins and well padded consciences but a moderate and transient irritation, which yet rankles in the unsophisticated mind of earnest youth. Conscience, then, begins to scratch, and this may go on to a chronic eczema or lichen furiosus, that leaves no repose. Coinciding with diathesis, a sermon may initiate persistent neurosis, usually of the hypochondriac, or occasion great distress in tender souls, who hav yet sense enough left not to show it in society. This morbid sense of sinfulness rarely fastens upon criminals, or on persons of a strong aggressiv will, but torments innocent victims of a false ideal. That crown of thorns which your Jesus wore up the hill of Calvary, millions of Christians since hav worn, and still wear, inside their skulls. Sin is, like dust, everywhere, and the most wholesome soil is but dust in the eyes of the housewife. And her doctrinal bias makes a sin of dust. She often thus gets dust upon the brain, looks for it everywhere, and never will rest till she gets it in her lungs. Lunatic asylums are populous with church doctrins. Now, the keener the pangs of neuralgia, or the more intolerable the itching, the greater the demand for morphine, chloroform, and patient-killers for palliation. The more morbid the conscience, the greater the demand for priestly mediation, and the larger the income of the churches. Like hypochondriacs, whose ailments form their staple of conversation, the neuralgic conscience is eternally prating or writing of its sinfulness. It caresses its pet evils; there is no piece of interference which it will resent more than the attempt to prove to it that these evils are imaginary.

If some reader astraddle on the fence, between the moral night and day worlds, has a chronic affection for the pet word, sin, let us respect his indecision; but if he would learn what true conviction and repentance mean, let him read, penetrate, analyze, and realize the social truths dramatized by Eugene Sue in the Count Dariveau of that noble romance, "Martin Les Miserès des Enfans Trouvés."

In the tropics, where the bite of the Abyssinian fly may prove fatal, clerical doctrins prove equally so, as in Hindostan, Mexico, and some African country lately visited by Tunisian explorers (Popular and Scientific Monthly), where the Man in the Moon is the brother of Allah and orthodox God. Temperament, doubtless, is here an important factor. Religion rarely strikes in very deep upon the sanguin temperament, though it may readily excite to dangerous combats, as in time of the Crusades, etc. To estimate, however, the influence of churches by their doctrins is fallacious. You can't tell a cow's milking qualities by the sound of her bell. Clerical venoms are, at worst, but accessory to the main objects, power and pelf.

Doctrins are words; words form language, and language is the art of concealing our purposes. The more absurd a doctrin, the fitter to rivet attention; as a chalk line drawn on the floor before the nose of a chicken will fix it to the spot more effectivly than placing a board there. Doctrins, portentous and sinister, like that yon eternal flaming hell, wakening wonder and fear, vibrate through brains whose susceptibilities, in the sleep of ignorance, are cumulativ by imagination. Such doctrins, so conditioned, most effectivly relax the sphincter of the purse.

Churches are organisms constructed for the absorption of property. The Catholic church, with its Jesuit proboscis, is the most complete organ of this parasitic function possessed by humanity, or which takes possession of it. Archimedes might die of envy in contemplating the perfection of its mechanism. Cumulating depletory faculties which adapt it to the exploitation of either capital or labor, it adds to the tenacity and abdominal capacity of the tick, which expands with the occasion, the ubiquity of the flea, the psalmody of the musketo, and the Briarean tentacles of the pieuvre, or octopus (see Hugo's "Travailleurs de la Mer"). Do you begin to understand the benevolent subtlety with which divine providence disposes of its victim creatures for the nourishment of priestcraft?

> "Did you eber see de debble,
> Wid 'is iun spoon and shubble,
> A peepin' troo a brush pile,
> Jis afore day?"

From the inculpation of moral theology by lunatic asylums, justice requires allowance for cases in which certain doctrins hav given their color to the insanity, but only as adjuvants, other originating causes having pre-existed. In many observed cases, however, and in at least one of which I hav certain knowledge, the neuralgia of conscience was absolutely and simply the effect of religious convictions, and was dissipated as soon as religious meditation and the prayerful mood were replaced by industrial and social activity.

Radical cures require change of site and occupation, in rural life especially. Spade-work has great healing power over doctrinal disease. Voltaire's genius is most subtle and evinces profound observation in sending, by the force of circumstances, his Dr. Pangloss lot of crazy philosophers to find natural cure in garden work for their subsistence.

Reason, being antipathic to superstition, is preventiv, but is feeble as a curativ.

The emotional sphere having been compromised, it is through emotion that curativ agents influence most directly. Humor and wit, which season reason with fun, and shake the diaphragm with laughter, acting thus at once upon the brain and sympathetic ganglia, are more potent than reason alone.

Voltaire's shaft hits the bulls-eye on the target of superstition, while the serious D'Holbach or sentimental Rousseau glance aside. Paine's emotional prescriptions combine the sense of the absurd with indignation. Their American disciple, Col. Ingersoll, carries the masses, while Parker and Renan sway only the judicious few. Bakounine is superior to all of them by the integrality of his sweep over the compound superstition of state and church. What prostrate humanity now needs to raise it is a genius combining Bakounine and Proudhon with the wit of a Voltaire. What has Proudhon to do with it? Proudhon struck a death-blow at financial parasitism, by the institution of the Labor Exchange Bank,* eschewing all state intervention. Government stopped this by his imprisonment.

The state or general government, the church, and capital, under its three forms of usury, monopoly, and stock-jobbing, are all alike parasitic, useless, and cumbersome, demoralizing and depletory on labor. Solidary in their conspiracy against humanity, no one of them can die alone, for each will be perpetually reproduced by the others. The integral medicin of absorbent substitution kills this parasite trinity by that of the Labor Exchange Bank, faith in justice and charity, and organized co-operation. Let the evolutionists who dethrone the miscreating God of parasites help us to evolve a god of honest men from the realization of these principles. EDGEWORTH.

The National Liberal League.

While the nomination of favorit distinguished Liberals for the presidency of the League is engaging so much attention, will it not be well to remember that change of officers can never of itself effect the needed change in the organization, practical working, and efficacy of the League? True, much depends on the president, and, if we mistake not, very much more on the secretary. Both must possess ability, energy, perseverance, tact, and judgment; and, as Brother S. P. Putnam, in his very able article in THE TRUTH SEEKER, so wisely suggests, they should giv their whole time, devoting heart and soul to the work. Yet the most able and efficient officers will fail to insure success without the earnest, constant, practical cooperation, of not alone its present members, but all true Liberals. It is lamentable to look over the field, see the vast amount of brain and money available, and yet how very little is being accomplished.

Only by agitation, by presenting facts, awakening thoughts, and discussion can we hope to attain the much-needed thorough and perfect organization that shall giv us a live, working, branch League or Liberal lyceum, with its regular weekly meetings, in every school district in the United States.

We depend on the National Liberal League to secure more united and efficient work in behalf of secular government, equal rights to all, a true, responsible liberty, and advancement in all that pertains to truth and scientific knowledge.

The League should be reorganized with a view to the benefit, not alone of avowed Liberals, but of thousands of honest hearts who are looking for beacon lights to lead them from the errors of the past—from useless rites and ceremonies to principles of reason, right, and truth, and to the harmonizing that large class who are seeking a higher plane of thought and action.

We hav no right to expect the triumph of universal mental liberty until thorough organization has brought all Liberals to realize they hav an individual work to do now, this very day, and every day, and a spirit of emulation is aroused. They best shall work, who best agree.

Hobby-riders and I-am-ites hav often forced people to think, opened up discussion, induced investigation, and so far hav done good work. But however laudable or praiseworthy their hobby or pet ism may be of itself, when they refuse their support and earnest cooperation in efforts to secure the secularization of our government because they cannot hav their pet ism grafted on the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and compel all to ride their pet hobby-horse, in season and out of season, they cease to be Liberals, and become intolerant cranks, intolerable boxes, and should be ignored.

We are either Liberal or intolerant; and the time has come for personal examination and decision—which? If Liberals, let us liv out the first great principles of Liberalism, do justice, love mercy, and endeavor to make our fellow-creatures happy, freed from the shackles of superstition, illumined by the light of truth. We are under obligations to co-operate with heart, energy, and pocketbook in the endeavor to help others to the same joy, peace, freedom, and happiness we experience. Is it just, is it merciful, to leave friends and neighbors to grope in the dark quagmires of superstition, when with a little effort we could lead them out into the broad, green fields of science and freedom? Why should not Liberals of all shades of opinion unite in the great and noble work of disenthralment of honest hearts from the meshes of superstition and priestcraft, in educating children in the glorious and ennobling truths of science, in cultivating love of nature, the study of her laws, and inciting a spirit of self-sacrificing effort in securing universal mental liberty?

How can this be effected but by thorough and efficient organization? In view of the importance of the matter, will others of our leading Liberals, following the example of Brother Putnam, giv the subject their earnest attention, and write out their views for THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and other leading Liberal papers?

Would it not be advisable for Brother H. L. Green and the executiv committee of the New York State Freethinkers' Association to engage the best available talent to prepare, and at the evening sessions of the Convention present, plans and suggestions for making the National Liberal League more effectiv, and devote the morning sessions to ten-minute speeches, discussing the suggestions of the speakers of the previous evening, and interchanging their opinions on this subject, so that at the Congress of the League prompt, intelligent, and effectiv action can be taken, and it be made plain that it is to the interest, as well as the duty, of Liberals of all shades of opinion to become activ, zealous, working members?

If it proves impossible to so remodel the League that it will meet the necessities of the times, then make a new departure—form an organization that will. CHARLES B. REYNOLDS.

How Ought Liberals to Vote?

For a long time this has been an unsolvable problem. Just at this time it is quite as difficult as ever before. The Liberals hav themselvs neutralized whatever of influence they might hav had in political matters by dividing their votes among the various political parties. What is the result? Both the great political parties of the republic opened their national caucuses with prayer, and one of them closed with "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow." This in a country where Jefferson, Paine, and Franklin served as chief patriots.

Only one thing is plain: the Liberals hav not disposed of their votes in a manner to make themselvs respected by the politicians. Having no title to the sympathy or support of any party now in existence, it would seem that the only thing left for them to do would be to form a party of their own; yet this is for grave and sufficient reasons impracticable. For this year, at least, the Liberals must support one or all of the parties now in existence. Let us look over the ground and see where most consistently they can locate their fealty and their sympathies.

Butler does not represent the Liberals. He poses simply as the demagog of the laboring men. He is very pious when he thinks votes can be obtained in that way. There is no one the Liberals can less afford to support than a hypocrit. The Democratic party is the party of the Catholic church. It is the mission of that party to gratify Ireland and the pope. The Catholic vote is not large—not larger than the Liberal vote; but it is compact, it always goes in one direction. It counts for all that it is worth. It has still another advantage: it not only votes all together, but with a large number of other voters. Should the Liberals form a party of their own, it would be really their own. It would avail nothing because of the paucity of its numbers. Every voter in that party would hav to shoulder all the mud that has ever been heaved at the Infidel; only the few Stalwarts of the Liberals would be found working at the poles. The Liberals cannot afford to join the ranks of the Catholic party and help to rivet the chain which the pope is gradually weaving around the republic. Not far distant is the day when the minions of the pope will demand public support for their nun-taught schools in this republic. To defer that day, even unto eternity, is the sworn determination of the Liberals. Nothing is clearer than that the Liberals will not partake of the Democratic oyster.

The Republican party is as distinctly the party of the Protestants as the Democratic is of the Catholics. Liberals, it is true, are much more in sympathy with the former than with the latter. And while the Catholic church stands fast by its infallible pope, its wafers, and its mass, the Protestants are breaking up into hundreds of sects—each new one, with the exception of the Salvation Army, coming nearer and nearer the ideal of the Liberal thinkers, and more and more in harmony with the demonstrations of science.

In view of this fact, it would seem, at first glance, that the Liberals ought to make their peace with the Republican party—but then there is the nomination. Is James G. Blaine a man the Liberals can consistently support? Who will answer this question, bearing constantly in mind the fact that Cleveland vetoed a bill which a Democratic legislature had passed to fee their Catholic adherents out of the state treasury? Some day there will be a Democratic legislature, perhaps a Democratic Congress, and there will be no sturdy Cleveland at the head of public affairs to lay upon sectarian bills the eternal fiat of the executiv veto.

When we come to this closer inspection, it appears that for this coming election the choice of the Liberals is between, not Blaine and Cleveland, or the Republican party and the Democratic party, but between the Republican party, with its more Liberal principles, and Cleveland, the sturdy defender of the people against the aggressions of the Catholic church.

The implication is that the Liberals are really of that growing new party which never yet has put a candidate of its own into the field, but still has a marked influence upon the political features of the country, the independent voters. This is a gun-squad that fires wherever it will do the most good. Very consistently it may support Cleveland this fall and on a recurring election support a candidate of its own or of any other party. Here is an attempt to go behind all parties and cliques and cast a vote which will represent some great principle which is on the point of being crucified by the stupid or selfish political demagogs.

The Independent Voters is the name of the party which at the present time best fits the purposes of the Liberals and which givs them an opportunity to support a candidate who is liable to be punished for an act which is demanded in the very Demands of Liberalism. John Kelly and his heelers are against Cleveland for this very veto. If for this they are against him, is that not reason enough for us to be for him? Whom shall we reward, if not those who act in accordance with our demands? Can we expect officials to do our bidding if we do not sustain them for so doing? So far as Liberalism is concerned, this is the only issue the present campaign offers. On which side shall we be found? LIBERTA.

The Old, Old Question.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER Sir: "What will you giv us in place of Christianity?" is a question often asked by many people, who, not being quite certain their own unaided efforts will enable them to attain perfect happiness in eternity, endeavor with a sort of passiv complacency to convince themselvs they implicitly believe in the alleged promises of Christ, and cling to them as the infallible sheet anchor of hope to ward off all temptations of the flesh in this world, and exempt them from all possible danger of hell-fire in the next. We presume the professing Christian will admit that none but those of pure life truly merit eternal happiness. But we hav only to attend a few Sundays at any church to be convinced that the average church-member is no more to be relied on for strict business integrity or general moral purity than his Infidel neighbor. It follows then as a logical sequence that the mere profession of religion, or a passiv acquiescence in its absurd tenets, does not infallibly purify the morals, or, as Christians felicitously express themselvs, regenerate the carnal nature of man. Can we be so stupid as to think a mere tacit belief in any set of dogmas can regenerate the human heart? The mind must first be educated and purified before any permanent improvement is possible. The believers in the Bible, being imperativly limited as to what they shall or shall not believe, never can become advanced students in natural science, in geological knowledge, or a rational comprehension of those more abstruse philosophical laws forming the only true guides to mental advancement. What does it signify to become perfectly versed in the Mosaic account of creation and yet remain profoundly ignorant of the fact that what is there recorded is, if we place any reliance on modern geological discoveries, utterly incapable of being reconciled with science or reason? An understanding of Darwin, Spencer, Haeckel, Huxley, or Tyndall, that bright constellation of chosen spirits who hav illuminated our favored century, must totally wreck one's childish trust in the scriptural rendition of insolvable phenomena, and stamp the account of creation, so soon succeeded by the fall of man, with its attendant horrors, to be the senseless vision of an uncultured brain. The author, or, more properly speaking, the authors of Genesis had conceived a crude image of an unknown something beyond human power, but as yet had not basked in the effulgent rays of true knowledge, which can only be truly said to be divine.

To-day, with all the aids we hav from every clime, and every type of intellect, the beginning, its how and when, remain an insolvable mystery still. How human life, with its vivifying and etherealizing essence, the intangible soul, first became a part and parcel of infinity, man may never know. Yet of this we are positivly assured; creation, as the spontaneous result of omnipotent volition, could not hav been the modus operandi. We are irresistibly forced to seek a solution of the grand problem by some more reasonable method. But with Moses how easy it appeared as the effect of divine volition; God, the barbaric term for the incomprehensible, created this endless universe at one supreme effort. From a condition of absolute chaos—dark, shapeless, lifeless—this long slumbering vacuity suddenly took on the rapt harmony of infinity, and life and time began! Imagin the stupendous change—absolute nothingness becoming instantaneously replete with life and soul and immortality! What had been up to that moment wrapt in night's most somber mantle suddenly blooms radiant with life, animation, the rays of supernal intelligence! Only an uneducated and yet vividly imaginativ mind would hav conceived the Mosaic process—Titanic, certainly, yet utterly antagonistic to every effort of nature as we behold her at the present day. Anyone making it a study will not fail to observe that nature's processes are ever slow; her evolutions may require centuries ere any radical change is quietly accomplished. The causes culminating in volcanic eruptions or the action of earthquakes are doubtless snail-like in their respectiv careers. But we cannot cite volcanic action as an illustration in the child theory of creation, for we must remember that as yet cause and effect were unknown, only a creator existing as the supreme ruler of an utterly dead, endless vacuum. And the Christian is duly trained to believe his soul's salvation is imperiled if he even doubt this primitiv theory touching a something man will never know with absolute certainty.

We take a long stride down the ages, and lo! we hav the divine conception of Christ, his immaculate birth, his god-like nature blended with human form, his life absolutely spotless and radiant with miracles! Blasting the fig-tree and raising the dead seem certain evidence of divine power, surely. But can we be perfectly certain those miracles were in reality accomplished?

To understand how easy the performance of a miracle—related by flying rumor at the time, and subsequently recorded on the page of partisan history—we must ever bear in mind that in ancient times any phenomenon not directly understood was ignorantly attributed to the exercise of supernatural powers—in other words, to the intervention of a god or goddess. Had they possessed an intimate knowledge of the laws of nature, this stupid belief in miracles could never hav obtained. A liberal diffusion of scientific knowledge was utterly unknown; ignorant rumor and magnifying tradition supremely ruled the herd. Just imagin, if you will, the total annihilation of the printing-press and all its wonderful modern triumphs. Realize, if you can, the mental stultification, the utter dearth of every grand idea, each noble sentiment the "art preservativ of arts" has infused into the great throbbing soul of the human race! Just this hapless condition, neither more nor less, represents man in the time of Moses, and again four thousand years afterward, at the advent of Christ, the printing-press as yet unknown to redeem man from his long slumber in the terrible Lethe of barbarous ignorance. How easy, then, to promulgate by tradition the miracle of creation! The spurious record once established, a religion based on other miracles, eagerly swallowed by the untutored dupes, followed as a matter of course. The priesthood next became a necessary adjunct of human society. From time to time the fiction would naturally require bracing and strengthening. We hav the grand culmination in the fictitious birth of Christ, and his many spurious miracles—the deceitful records of lying priests, each and every one setting at utter defiance every known immutable law in the grand harmony of nature. It may be pertinently assumed that, even allowing Christ to hav been divine, he could not set nature's laws aside and be consistent. A God, to be a God, must be perfectly in accord with his own laws. Even omnipotence—supposing such a power to exist—cannot violate a law stamped by the Almighty fiat as immutable. We must candidly confess, then, that miracles can only be performed by lying tradition to further a selfish end; and here, indeed, we hav the only rational key to the entire business.

I think no more need be said to convince any reasoning mind that this is the true solution of all supernaturalism. Would it not appear reasonable to suppose that any religious system based so evidently on error as is Christianity would inevitably sink to oblivion? And such, undoubtedly, will be its ultimate fate, for the human mind cannot always be enslaved, although it would seem as if the very last use the multitude make of reason is to think. I hav asked myself the question, as I jot these lines, Will the world ever happily arrive at that stage when virtue, in unsullied purity, shall rule supreme in every human heart? Will strict business integrity, unbiased by selfish motivs, unstained by even a shadow of suspicion, become the rule in daily life? Can we hope to see Right finally triumph, and Truth maintain her gentle sway over the minds of men?

Such an arcadian condition of life terrestrial is certainly most desirable, in place of the sordid and hypocritical civilization which is so glaringly the result of religious beliefs founded on preposterous fallacies. So long as the seeds of groveling superstition are sown on every hand, we can hav no true civilization permeating the great mass of mankind. While men passivly yield obedience to the usurped dictum of priestcraft, they will, in effect, retrogress, for it is a law of nature that nations cannot remain physically or intellectually immobil; hence true enlightenment, to exist at all, must ever steadily advance. The slime of debauching superstition is being instilled daily into the minds of the young. The priestly brotherhood never slumber. The present occasion is ever being dextrously improved. They lurk with smooth address and unctuous smiles in all the highways and byways of life, their only aim being ever and always to perpetuate their influence over the minds of their unsuspecting dupes. Often in contemplating the various phases of human life, it has seemed to me our modern millionaires would do well to reflect that their lives, having only the prestige of wealth to perpetuate their fame, must ever be utterly ignoble compared with those whose intellectual works hav lastingly benefited the human race.

Compare, if you please, for a moment the infinit mine of mental wealth which Charles Darwin left as his grand legacy to remotest posterity, with the paltry heap of coin so basely acquired by a soulless Vanderbilt or Gould. How immeasurably superior and enduring the heartfelt tribute of respect paid to true, unselfish genius, rather than the fleeting admiration of the fickle crowd, which fawns and flatters only to despise and forget when the vain pageant of gaudy wealth has passed by!

This, my friends, is the precious seed I would like to see take root in the mental and moral world—an enlightened understanding of natural cause and effect—rather than linger unsprouting in the deadly shade of this blighting upas-tree, Christianity. And I wish to see implanted in the hearts of all the purpose, ever inviolate, of living here so that the approach of death might well be greeted with a fearless smile. I would hav no grinning monsters lurking in the infinit vista of eternal love. In their place let there be the calm resignation of a pure soul to the dispensation of that all-pervading spirit of which the humblest life forms an inseparable part.

Christianity based exclusivly on supernaturalism and unreasoning faith in impossible incongruities can never grant man the all to which he justly aspires. We may bend the knee of superstition to the anthropomorphous idol, vainly styled Jehovah, and yet be infinitly removed from true civilization. So long as that loathsome relic of barbarism—a belief in miracles—forms part and parcel of our every-day life, we halt lamely on the imperfect level of pious savagery, and are to all intents and purposes even below the worshipers of Isis or Diana.

Prohibitory and Sumptuary;

AND TO MY CRITICS.

[EXPLANATORY.—The following is composed of parts of several articles written last winter and more lately, and for which the editor did not find room. He returned them to me recently with the request that I should condense them into an article of fair length. This I hav endeavored to do, though the task has necessitated the elimination of much of vital importance to the discussion, including all of my reply to Mr. Ray.]

I am somewhat surprised that even "Liberta" should take the position he does regarding the use of the term, "sumptuary laws," when it is remembered how completely I destroyed his argument upon that very subject in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 28, 282, to which "Liberta" and our readers are respectfully referred.

If my opponent thinks that the quotations which he makes from Bauvier's Law Dictionary are any help to him, he is assuredly welcome thereto. Whatever the avowed objects may be, the end sought is the same—the limitation of individual expenses; and that, too, for the declared reason that such luxury "is opposed to public policy." Why, what is the greatest evil of intemperance, as asserted by temperance men and prohibitionists alike? Is it not the waste of labor fruits in the purchase of intoxicants, and the consequent misery brought upon women and children, and the drain upon the pocket of the tax-payer? The expensivness of the drinking habit is one of the standard arguments of the prohibitionist, used by him invariably in support of his proposition. Sumptuary laws are laws intended to curtail "the expenses of the people;" prohibitory laws are laws intended to accomplish the same purpose—so asserted by prohibitionists, by them everywhere loudly proclaimed and most sharply emphasized. The prohibitionist avers that prohibition will prevent extravagance, will limit expense in the matter of drinks. A law which does this is, by the authority which "Liberta" quotes, a sumptuary law, and yet he waxes mighty wroth when I state that sumptuary laws and prohibitory laws are essentially the same. And yet "Liberta" talks glibly of my asserted ignorance or dishonesty!

In my previous article, referred to above, I quoted Webster upon this very point, and I now reproduce his definitions: "Sumptuary—relating to expenses; regulating expenses or expenditure." "Sumptuary laws or regulations—such as restrain or limit the expenses of citizens in apparel, food, furniture, or the like." "Liberta" says that prohibitory laws will "restrain or limit the expenses of citizens" in drinks; authority says that this is the province of sumptuary laws.

Again, Webster defines a prohibitionist to be "one who favors prohibitory duties in commerce." If this does not show the generic relationship of "prohibitory" and "sumptuary," then language has no meaning.

But this is not all. Bauvier says that sumptuary laws "originated in the view that luxury is, in some of its degrees, opposed to public policy, and that the state is bound to interfere against it," referring to Montesquieu. But why opposed to "public policy?" The natural inference is that luxury tends to immorality and crime, as most moralists hav asserted, and that this tendency should be nipped in the bud by a cutting off of supplies. Now, the second leading argument of prohibitionists is precisely similar; they assert that intemperance leads to immorality and crime, that it tends to make men bad citizens, and, therefore, the state should, by prohibitory laws, cut off the supplies.

In a word, sumptuary laws were enacted to curtail the expenses of the people as a matter of public policy; prohibitory laws are enacted to curtail the expenses of the people, and as a matter of public policy. In the first instance, we hav an interference with the private business concerns of the individual, ostensibly for the public good—i. e., to prevent immorality and crime. In the second, we hav a like interference for the public good—i. e., to prevent immorality and crime. But "Liberta" will doubtless object—it is a common dodge of the sumptuary champions—that whereas sumptuary laws say what shall not be bought, prohibitory laws prescribe what shall not be sold. There is a distinction here, but the difference is less than the difference 'twixt tweedle dum and tweedle dee. When you deny the means to a given end, you deny the end. The right to use implies the right to buy; the right to buy involves the right to sell. To deny the right to sell is to deny the right to buy, and to deny the right to buy is to deny the right to use. When you prevent the manufacture and sale of a certain article, you prevent its use. Whether or not the attempt succeeds makes no difference in the intent. And the buyer and user is equally a criminal with the manufacturer and seller.

Suppose that we hav an interdict laid upon the manufacture and sale of broadcloth coats—we will not stop to consider the reasons for such interdict—will "Liberta" contend that this is not sumptuary, that the right of the citizen to buy and wear is not interfered with? Where would be the difference between such a law and the prohibitory law, so far as the right of the citizen to purchase and use is concerned?

"Liberta" may now bring on some more "discriminating writers" and invoke a little more "authority," but I would kindly advise him, for his own sake, to be a little more "discriminating" in his selections.

"Liberta" does me too much harm in attributing to me the direct or indirect authorship of the Seventh plank of the Milwaukee platform. He must aim his scatter-gun at larger game, at better known and more influential Liberals than I. And our friend should know that the resolutions adopted by any Congress of the League are but the expressed opinions of the majority which adopts them, and are not in any sense binding upon dissentients. This principle was made very clear during the discussion of the postal law repeal resolutions, and it is a mystery to me how an anonymous writer, who evidently did not attend that Congress, can consider himself compromised in any way by the action of those who were there.

"Liberta" has strayed upon personal liberty grounds toward the close of his article, and I am persuaded that he, consciously or unconsciously, copied this, with which I am very willing to close, from the utterances of some anti-prohibitionist: "If we are, indeed, such miserable creatures that we cannot be moral and decent unless controled by some authority, let us, in justice to ourselvs, hunt up a master and submit ourselvs unto him."

Friend Jamieson says that he is "pelted with epithets" because he regretted that by the Seventh plank of the Milwaukee Congress the League was made "the tool of the rum-selling power," as he alleged. The facts of the case are, as the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know, that I never called in question Mr. Jamieson's right to dissent from that plank, that I simply repelled his most uncalled for and ungenerous reflections upon the character and motivs of those who voted "Aye" upon that question. I "pelted" no one "with epithets," but I did characterize as they deserved the epithets he heaped upon the personal liberty members of that Congress.

It is no use, Mr. Jamieson; you cannot but fail in your attempt to obscure the issue by trying to make it appear that some one is abusing you for dissenting from the Seventh plank. You well know that it was not your opinions and motivs which I criticised, but rather your unfair reflections upon the opinions and motivs of others. In support of this it is only necessary to quote this passage from your last letter: "It may be, too, that the men and women who passed it [the Seventh resolution] are as strictly temperate as I dare be. If they are, they hav a queer way of showing it." Queer to your conception, perhaps, my dear sir, but you hav no grounds for insinuating that T. B. Wakeman, T. C. Leland, W. F. Peck, Juliet H. Severance, A. B. Severance, Mrs. H. S. Lake, and scores of other well known Liberals who disagree with you upon this subject are one whit less temperate in their habits than yourself. Into this one short paragraph you hav condensed all to which I objected in your first note, and conclusivly proven that I was completely justified in criticising the tone and animus of said note.

But further along in his last letter, friend Jamieson tries to mend the matter a little by attempting to show that the church could as easily prove a lack of interested connection with the slave power of the ante-bellum days as temperance anti-prohibitionists can their lack of pecuniary connection with the rum power. He says that the church claims that we found fault with the Abolitionists because of their methods, but that she "was as much the friend of freedom as Abolitionists dare be." Of course there are no facts to support this assertion. In the first place, the church did hav a pecuniary connection with slavery. The spokesmen of its various branches knew that to declare against slavery was to arouse against them the prejudices of the masses, and to very materially lessen the revenues of the church. New England manufacturing interests bowed in cowardly submission before the gold god and under the lash of the overseer; and the church North, as a body, dared not risk the loss of popular favor and the dollars of those who fattened on the unrequited labor of the slave. The connection—the interested, pecuniary connection—between the church both North and South and the slave power was most intimate and powerful. On the other hand, it will be impossible for Mr. Jamieson to show such a connection, or anything akin thereto, between the rum power and the Liberals whose opinions and actions are at issue between us.

In the second place, the church opposed the Abolitionists, not because of their methods particularly, but because they sought to bring into disrepute and to destroy a Bible institution. The church, through its representativs, defended slavery as a divine institution, and hurled the Bible at the heads of May, and Phillips, and Foster, and Garrison, and Lucretia Mott, and their co-workers.

As there is no parallel between the attitude of the church toward slavery and our attitude toward the liquor traffic, as Mr. Jamieson vainly claims, so, also, there is no parallel between slavery and intemperance, save that both are evils, as is Christianity, tobacco using, etc.

Slavery is the exploitation of man by man, the forcible denial of the right of contract, of the right of locomotion, of individual initiativ, of the right to possess and enjoy the fruits of one's own labor, of the right to form and continue social and sexual relations without interference from any "owner," and of the right to a voice in the enactment of laws by which one is to be governed. These rights slavery denies and forcibly alienates; intemperance does nothing of the sort. Intemperance is a personal vice, and, like all other vices, it may lead to the injury of others, and the remedy for this is to be sought and found nowhere else than in the scientific education of all, and the sweeping away of all statutes which limit liberty and deaden enterprise. Prohibition is of the same genus as slavery, possessing many of the characteristics of the latter tyranny. It, too, is a denial of the right of contract, of individual initiativ, of the peaceful possession and use of the results of one's own toil—all this directly, while indirectly it is guilty of opening the door for the admission of nearly all the other evils of which slavery was guilty.

Says Mr. Jamieson: "Prohibition is no more a contradiction of personal liberty than was abolition. If I am illogical, let us hav the proof, and not mere assertion." Per contra, prohibition and personal liberty are at the antipodes, and so are prohibition and abolition, and the proof you will find above, and in the files of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last two years, where I hav adduced it, Ossa upon Pelion. Abolition demanded personal liberty; prohibition denies it. The old antislavery struggle is dragged into the discussion of many questions by writers whose zeal outruns their logical acumen, and whose argument is completely refuted by the lessons it gave to the world; and Mr. Jamieson's present contention is a case in point.

Again says Mr. Jamieson: "Does it logically follow, because I am heartily in favor of the right of the people to promulgate even wrong opinions, that I am equally in favor of wrong conduct? Is this a specimen of friend Walker's logic?" No, to both questions; and it is a specimen of friend Jamieson's logic—and a very poor specimen of a very poor species it is, too. Talk about the "logic of the pulpit," and "subtle sophism!" Certainly our friend should be a good judge of both, judging by the sample he givs us. If to be opposed to wrong conduct legitimately leads to the suppression of wrong conduct by law, then to be opposed to wrong opinions legitimately involves the suppression of wrong opinions by law. And the converse of this must be true also; if we favor right opinions and right conduct, then, according to Mr. Jamieson's logic, we are bound to favor their inculcation and enforcement by law. The fallacy of Mr. Jamieson's assumptions lies in this, that he assumes that the question of the rightfulness, or righteousness, of actions is what is at issue, whereas that is not the question at all. We all agree that righteousness is very desirable, that wrong conduct should be condemned; but we divide wrong actions into two general classes, crimes and vices, and we include intemperance in the last, while prohibitionists place it in the first class. Thus we perceive that whether or not we are in favor of wrong conduct, that is not the question, the issue between us being whether we should supress all wrong conduct by law. Prohibitionists say, Yes; we say, No.

Another sample: "Because I say that 'Liberty is Virtue's mother,' I was not aware that I stood committed, logically, to the notion that Ruin is the daughter of Liberty." This, of course, is intended to prove that the suppression of the liquor traffic by law would not be in violation of the principles of liberty. Let us see how this works. "Because I say that 'Liberty is Virtue's mother,' I was not aware that I stood committed, logically, to the notion that Christianity is the daughter of Liberty." By a parity of reasoning, according to the canons of the Jamieson textbook of logic, that gentleman is bound to demand the suppression of Christianity by law!

There come to me through the mails numerous inquiries relativ to the discussion on prohibition which has been going on in THE TRUTH SEEKER for some years. Friends are urging me to notice some of the many critics who hav attacked me since my last article appeared in this journal, among which critics may be named Elliott Preston and A. B. Pikard.

I need not say that fresh hands hav advanced nothing new, for that fact is self-evident to all thinking men and women who hav closely followed the discussion which for more than two years has been carried on through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and one side of which has been chiefly conducted by me. But in spite of the fact that whatever is yet to be said must be, in the main, only repetitions of what has already been said, I should be very glad, for the sake of new readers, to continue the discussion if the editor is willing, for I esteem it a subject of vital importance—one forced upon us in multiform ways by the potent moralists of the press, rostrum, and halls of legislation.

One word in closing on the general principle involved. I can easily understand how Freethinkers can disagree among themselvs regarding the existence of a God, the continued or immortal life of man, etc.; I can understand how they may naturally differ upon such subjects as the marriage relation, the finances, voting, industrial, and other problems, but how any Freethinker can espouse prohibition is the deepest, most inexplicable of mysteries. I hav honestly tried to place myself at the point of view of the Liberal (?) prohibitionist, but I could find no such point. When I reached that "point—no point" I was no longer a Liberal, standing upon a Liberal platform, reasoning upon the line of Liberal principles, but a Christian, standing upon a Christian platform, and following a line of Christian logic.

Years ago, when a Christian, I was also an ardent prohibitionist. This was the only natural, logical, and consistent position I could then take. But all was changed when I accepted the principles of Freethought, and I must now say, at the risk of being called a bigot by those who are themselvs so bigoted that they would by fines, confiscation, and imprisonment coerce those who cannot agree with them, that no man who accepts the fundamental principles of Freethought, knowing what it is that he accepts, can be a prohibitionist.

Yours for a Liberalism consistent with itself, and bottomed upon liberty. E. C. WALKER.

Unity in Diversity.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The splendid letter of S. P. Putnam, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 12th, shows clearly that he grasps the true idea of the Liberal movement. I second the nomination of Mr. Putnam for our next president of the National Liberal League, provided he can giv himself wholly to the work in accordance with his own lucid statement of the needs of the office.

H. L. Green is my next choice. Indeed, I do not know but he is my first choice, because I think he fills Mr. Putnam's prescribed requisits in every particular. He is practical, and the best organizer the Liberal movement has yet produced. While others hav been disputing with each other as to how they should organize, what "planks" should be put in, and what left out, he has gone ahead and organized. He has proved himself a man of deeds. He has refused to harbor animosities against his brethren who differ from him in opinion or methods. He has modestly worked, and organized the greatest Liberal association in this country. He has had the genius to perceive the genius of Liberalism: diversity of opinion. This diversity is deplored by some, but it is the grandest feature of mental liberty. Intellectual freedom leads to variety of thought and expression. It is inevitable, and desirable. Diversity of thought puzzled and baffled the church, puzzled and almost baffled the Liberals. The church sacrificed freedom of thought to unity. Thousands of Liberals hav stood ready to commit the opposit mistake, to sacrifice unity to freedom of thought. But liberty refused to accept any sacrifice. It demands justice and truth.

H. L. Green has organized thousands of Liberals on a simple, natural platform as broad as the expanded heavens and compact as the Catholic church.

Pipestone, Minn. W. F. JAMIESON.

Nominates Col. Ingersoll and Mr. Green.

The following resolutions were offered and passed unanimously by our League at a meeting July 22, 1884.

WHEREAS, the present officers of the National Liberal League (president and secretary) hav announced their determination to decline re-election, and

WHEREAS, we, the members of St. John's (Ill.) Liberal League, No. 93, believing that no individual is more worthy of honor than those who devote their lives to driving superstition from all places where it has been planted by vicious religions, and holding those in highest esteem who hav done most to emancipate the human mind from the horrible incubus of an angry, vengeful, irresponsible fetish they call God;

Therefore, we wish in some manner to record our thankfulness to those pioneers of Freethought, both living and dead, who hav done service in this neglected field.

As foremost and greatest among them all, we wish to tender our sincerest thanks and heartiest appreciation to the American citizen who stands in eloquence without a peer; in sagacity without an equal; in courage and in ability without a superior living or in history—a man whose name and noble work will liv long after priests, and presidents, and kings shall be forgotten.

If possible, we would request this honored citizen to giv his mighty talents exclusivly to the liberation of the mind of man, and to that end, and for the purpose of effecting a more perfect union of all phases of Freethought, we suggest that the presidency of the New National Secular Organization be tendered unanimously to Robert G. Ingersoll.

Furthermore, recognizing in Mr. H. L. Green one of the best organizers either inside or outside of Liberalism, we think a mistake would occur not to make him secretary.

Resolved, that the thanks of the League be tendered to the present National Liberal League officers for their unselfish and arduous labors.

Ordered, that a copy of these resolutions be sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Man, with a request to publish.

JOHN BALMER, President.
W. G. KNIGHT, Secretary.

Brother Gardner Preaches A Sermon.

"I has bin wonderin' if our orthodox religiun am not a leetle queer," observed Brother Gardner as the triangle sounded and the meeting settled down to business. "De odder day dar was a hangin' across de ribber. A man who had nebber darkened a church doah, as any one knew of—a man who had followed a low-down bizness all his life—a man who had eber sot a bad example to de youth of the land, was hung for murder. It was one of de coolest an' most bloodthirsty crimes of the aige. De murderer was tried by an honest jury, giben ebery show fur defense, an' the verdict was, guilty. De sentence of de law was carried out, an' our orthodox religiun took a hand in. It sent preachers to the murderer's cell to coax him into a change of heart. It sent men dar to sing de hymns dedicated to God. It sent women dar to tell him dat he war gwine straight from the scaffold to glory.

"When dat man walked out to die he believed hisself a martyr. He talked about de support which de Lawd was givin' him. His voice jined in singin' 'Nearer, My God, to Thee.' His life had been one unbroken career of sin. De climax was a foul murder. An' yit he was made to believe dat religiun would sail him straight to heaven's pearly gates!

"My fren's, if religiun takes a murderer to de same heaven dat it does de man who has lived upright all his days, I doan' want it!

"I speak to you in de most solemn airnestness when I tell you dat dis horrible burlesque—dis absurd mockery—dis farce played by lunatics around a murderer on de gallus—am sufficient to bring our religiun into vile contempt, an' to make sinners doubt dat it am anything beyond a vagary."—Detroit Free Press.

What Mr. Andrews Told the Union Reform League.

I write for the purpose of making you a short report of the meeting and proceedings of the sixth annual convention of the Union Reform League, which occurred here the fourth, fifth, and sixth insts. Of that organization I hav since the third meeting had the honor to act as president. Ezra H. Heywood is secretary, and Mrs. Mina M. Egli (late of Switzerland, now of Dakota) is corresponding secretary. A special interest attaches to the meeting of this year, as it is a sort of glorification over the immense triumph for the cause of Freethought and the freedom of the press which has recently occurred through the decision of Judge Pitman, at Worcester, quashing the indictment against Mr. Heywood on the charge of obscenity. The first impression that has gone forth, I believe, is that that decision—as such is usually the case in the quashing of indictments—related to the matter of form, as to the manner of bringing the action only, and that it merely lets Mr. Heywood off in this particular case, but without reaching the principle involved. This is a total mistake. The decision goes centrally to the merits of the case, and, coupled with that of Judge Nelson, in the previous case, at Boston, in the United States Court, virtually reverses the whole current of rulings in the case of Mr. Bennett by Judge Benedict, and puts the whole subject on the grounds which we hav all along contended for. I will in a subsequent communication take up and expound that matter; and so I will confine myself now mainly to giving an account of the convention.

Personally I hav been here something more than two weeks, enjoying the fresh air, the splendid scenery, and the serving hospitality of this Mountain Home. On the 4th of July the convention opened promptly at half-past ten o'clock, and continued during the three days, with three sessions each day, forenoon, afternoon, and evening, often inordinately prolonged from the seeming impossibility to procure adjournments, even for meals, the interest in the discussions overmastering the more mundane appetite; the evening discussions and business being prolonged, the last two days, till midnight or later. The town hall where we hav held our previous meetings having been burnt during the past year, this convention was held in the ample parlors of the Heywoods' (Mountain Home). The first session was inaugurated by the reading of the Declaration of Independence by Alfred E. Giles, Esq., the able lawyer and publicist of Hyde Park, Mass.—who was improvised into the chaplain of the occasion, and continued subsequently to officiate in that capacity at all the more solemn passages of our proceedings.

At the first session Mr. Heywood, in an opening statement, briefly noted the origin, history, and purpose of union reform, urging the necessity of associate effort, to appeal all questions of reform, law, and morals to personal sense of right and duty in the nature of things. In the afternoon Lyman A. Wiley, of Newfield, Mass., known among us as the Dennis Kearney of the East, gave one of his impetuous and electric speeches on the labor and money questions. Friday evening and one session of Saturday were given to the temperance question, and the discussion between Prohibitionists and moral suasionists was lively in the extreme. The speakers were, especially: P. B. Southwick, of Berlin, formerly of the Hopedale Community; Deacon J. T. Everett, of East Princeton, one of the most influential citizens of Princeton; A. H. Wood, of Lunenburg, the Nestor of reform in this whole region, and the youthful and genial wit of near upon eighty years of age; Wm. J. Melvin, the rising young journalist of Clinton; Mr. Giles, Mr. Heywood, and myself. Saturday evening was given to the free love question. Mrs. Egli opened the debate with a lucid, philosophic, and fearless statement. She was followed by Mrs. Wm. J. Melvin, and Mrs. J. S. Laigley, Mr. Southwick, Mrs. Heywood, and others. Mrs. Heywood's talk was spiced, as often happens, with audacities which even radical reformers are not much accustomed to hear, but nobody seemed to be alarmed or worried, and so free speech was vindicated. One session was given entire to Mr. Massena, who read a long but very instructiv paper on European Socialism, with an account of special investigations made by himself into the conditions of labor in the so-called "black" country of England. Part of another session was given to another gentleman from Europe (prudence prevents recording of the name) in exposition of Anarchism and Nihilism. Frank T. Howe, of Nashua, N. H., and M. A. Worth, of Waltham, Mass., added their contributions.

In fine, one session of the convention was given to an exposition of Alwato, one to an exposition of Universology, and one, the concluding session, to the nature and affairs of the Pantarchy. The session given to Alwato proved, I think unexpectedly to the audience, intensely interesting. Indeed, I hav never found any subject in which all sorts of people, the old and the young, the learned and the unlearned, can be more deeply interested than in the analysis of speech—an account of what we do and can do with our mouths, and language generally—when the subject is rightly handled. My six years of service in the introduction of phonography and the spelling reform, many years ago, provided me with an experience which makes me always sure of commanding the interested attention of my audience on that class of subjects. I addressed myself on this occasion especially to Master Hermes Sidney Heywood, a ten-year-old boy, and Miss Vesta Heywood, to whom we were indebted for our music. Phonetics and the spelling reform, going beyond the one language, English, culminate in a universal alphabet—one alphabet for the whole world—a unitary dress for all languages; and Alwato goes the additional step of being the one language for the whole world—wears that dress. Phonetics (the science), the basis of phonography and of the universal alphabet, is itself based upon the axiom, "One sign to one sound, and one sound to one sign." Alwato is based upon the further-on discovery that every sound, vowel, and consonant has a natural and inherent meaning; so that a universal language is one of the things which is, in the nature of things; and only awaited our discovering faculty—the same in that respect as music.

Universology is based on the similar discovery that unlimited things—infinitudes—like time, space, substance, etc., are like the vowel sounds in language, continuant, uninterrupted, and, therefore, one-like or unismal, while limits—things finiting other things—lines, edges, boundaries, etc., are like consonant sounds, breaky, discontinuant, interruptiv, and therefore two-like or duismal; so that there is an analogy or fundamental similitude between the make-up of the universe, with its infinitudes and boundaries, and the make-up of language, with its vowel and consonant sounds—which then goes further and proves to be a universal analogy or similitude between the elements and the combinations of elements in the make-up of any given sphere of being and the elements and combinations of elements in the make-up of each and every other sphere of being. This subject is somewhat more difficult, and requires a little more pluck, and more of the true student spirit, to be fully interested in it, and to master it. Its immense importance is known, however, to the few who hav studied it.

But the main subject among those especially assigned to me at the convention, and that of which I wish to giv a little further account, especially of what was transacted in that connection at the last meeting, is the Pantarchy. Three years ago the Union Reform League resolved itself into an auxiliary of the Pantarchy, but that action has remained somewhat barren of results. It was probably little more at the time than a generous and graceful compliment to me—a sort of vote of confidence, from which by the constitution of the Pantarchy it could withdraw at any moment, and which, therefore, it felt safe in rendering; and did not, as I knew, imply any very vital understanding of or interest in Pantarchism. That matter was left, therefore, to rest, and go for what it might, and not taken as a foundation to build upon. But, on this occasion, finding that there were two persons present newly known to me, who, from their reading, and from the expositions they listened to, seized with avidity and profundity of comprehension, and strong conviction, upon the central principles, the need, and the feasibility of the Pantarchal institution, and who were willing and anxious to lend their names and pledge their efforts for the more thorough founding of the Pantarchy, I resolved to take this opportunity for a step in advance in that direction. These two individuals were Mrs. Mina M. Egli, a lady of learning, remarkable clearness of perception, and the courage of her opinions, recently of Zurich, Switzerland, and more recently from Dakota, from which distant territory she came to attend this convention. The other is Monsieur L. F. Massena (Pierre Quiroule, his nom de plume), from Paris, France, a grandson of the distinguished General and Marshal Massena, of the first (Napoleonic) empire, himself a traveling correspondent for years past of Parisian and London newspapers, with a roving commission to visit all the countries of the world. His address is 12 Union street, London, England. Mrs. Egli is a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and through it and some correspondence had formed her very decided opinion of the Pantarchy before I met her here, where she still remains, and can be addressed for the present. To Mr. Massena the whole subject was new. The first passage between us was this: I handed him a copy of the "Transactions of the Colloquium," which bears upon the cover the motto of the Colloquium, which is also the motto, and, in fact, the fundamental constitution of the Pantarchy, as to its whole conception—these words:

MOTTO.—"In things proven, Unity; in whatsoever can be doubted, Free Diversity; in things not trenching upon others' rights, Liberty; in all things, Charity."

Mr. Massena had no sooner glanced his eye over this motto than he exclaimed, with great energy and appearance of conviction, "That is the grandest platform that I hav ever seen or heard of; and the first one upon which I am willing to base my life purpose, along with all who will stand upon it." As I hav piqued myself upon this last work of condensation in expressing the ultimate basis of all true human intercourse, which cost me much thought and effort—almost more than I hav spent upon anything else I hav ever done; and as I hav been not a little chagrined that my Radical friends hav made so little use of it—hav, indeed, manifested so little appreciation of it, I was, of course, greatly flattered and pleased at this off-hand verdict of an intelligent European. Further intercourse with Mr. Massena convinced me that his extended and varied travels and adventures all over the earth, and his extensiv acquaintance with the languages and with the habits and the needs of the various peoples, had peculiarly qualified him to grasp the idea of the political side of the Pantarchy—as the future type, beginning now, of the future government of the world. He has already lectured and written on subjects leading up to the idea. I think I may say, indeed, that after myself in this particular, speaking frankly, he is the first man I hav ever met who has distinctly developed what I may call a planetary ambition, in the good sense of the word. By this I mean the conception of the unification of mankind as the immediate feasible thing, leading us to begin at once and to work practically and earnestly by proper device of methods to organize the One Government for the Whole World. The nearest and most distinct approach to this conception which I hav found in any book, not of my own writing, is the following remarkable passage extracted from Lester F. Ward's "Dynamic Sociology:" "It therefore becomes the interest and the duty of society, throwing off the yoke of government, in the odious sense of that ill-conceived term, to establish a truly progressiv agency, which shall not only be a product of art, but which shall itself be an art. The institution, like all true arts, must be based upon the recognition of the reality and reliableness of the natural forces with which it is to experiment, and whose laws it is to utilize. These forces are the so-called social forces, as defined in a preceding chapter. The science which treats of them is Sociology. The art which consists in their application [which is the mode of their application] may still, for the want of a better term, be called government. But the present empirical, anti-progressiv institution, miscalled the art of government, must be transformed into a central agency of social sciences, which shall stand in the same relation to the control of men in which the polytechnic institute stands to the control of nature."

All this is pure Pantarchism; and is, indeed, so named by Mr. Ward himself elsewhere. It is a precise description of the University State, the central organization of the Pantarchy, as planned, programmed, and intended by me. Others here and in Europe are talking vaguely of the Universal Republic, the Parliament of the World, etc., but no other writer has so sensed the fact as Mr. Ward has, that the government of the future must and will be reduced to the organized results of science applied to the Collectiv Life of the World. And yet even with Ward this is, as yet, a mere speculativ programming of the idea. He does not propose to do anything about it here and now. The actual Pantarchy goes the step farther, and enters upon the work of practically organizing this universal government of the future into a real, concrete working existence—of course in mere germ, but as a thing which is to grow and fill the whole earth. The Pantarch is simply the volunteer head-center who undertakes to lead in this enterprise of promulgating the idea, and getting it into working condition, of rallying the scientific world to become practically reformatory, and of rallying reformers to become scientific, and then artismal. That I should assume this office myself, at least for the time being, is inevitable, if the thing is to be done, as there is nobody else who appreciates the conception, and is willing to giv the necessary time, labor, and devotion to its practical outworking.

These remarks apply more especially to the political side of the Pantarchy. It has numerous other branches—domestic, educational, inter-communicativ (lingual), artistic, religious, etc. In the general sense, including all these, in embryo, the Pantarchy has been inaugurated for more than twenty years, has had a name to liv, and has had a somewhat filmy and unrefined existence; but has been steadily engaged in necessary preliminary work. It has even not been altogether without a treasury based on the idea of voluntary tribute. Some thousands of dollars hav been contributed for publication, and other contingencies. A single gentleman has paid in more than a thousand dollars—he being a High Church Episcopalian, and not willing that his left hand should know what his right hand executes. But until the present occasion there has been no formal inauguration of the Political Side of the Pantarchy as a High and Scientific sort of Internationalism, looking to the bringing of all the nations and peoples of the earth into political unity. It was the presence, here, on this bright Fourth of July, and afterwards, of Mrs. Egli, the lady, scholar, and traveler, and of Mr. Massena, the world-wide traveler, earnest reformer, and prospectiv international statesman; with the com-
